That these discoveries should have been made since the vote of last session is quite as remarkable as that they should have been overlooked before that vote. But they were neither overlooked before nor discovered since. The vote was before a pending election. It is the will of the President which has been discovered since.

It is not at all surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the President having failed to sign the bill passed by the whole body of his supporters by both Houses at the last session of Congress, and having assigned, under the pressure of events, but without the authority of law, reasons, good or bad, first for refusing to allow the bill to become a law, and therefore usurping power to execute parts of it as law, while he discarded other parts which interfered with possible electoral votes, those arguments should be found satisfactory to some minds prone to act upon the winking of authority.

The weight of that species of argument I am not able to estimate. It bids defiance to every species of reply. It is that subtle, pervading epidemic of the time that penetrates the closest argument as spirit penetrates matter that diffuses itself with the atmosphere of authority, relaxing the energy of the strong, bending down the upright, diverting just men from the path of rectitude, and substituting the will and favor of power for the will and interest of the people as the rule of legislative action.

It is an evil which can be remedied only by the people of the United States in the selection of their Representatives, and when they send Representatives here of stuff impenetrable to that subtle essence, then reason and not the executive wishes will illuminate them on the merits and necessity of legislative measures. Till then I despair of reaching the source of their conduct.

All I desire now to do is to state the case and predict results from one course or the other. The course of military events seems to indicate that possibly by the 4th of next July, probably by next December, organized, armed rebellion will cease to lift its brazen front in the land. Disasters may intervene; errors or weaknesses may prolong the conflict; the proverbial chances of war may interpose their caprices to defer the national triumph; but events now point to the near approach of the end. But whether sooner or later, whenever it comes, there is one thing that will assuredly accompany it. If this bill do not become a law, when Congress again meets, at our doors, clamorous and dictatorial, will be sixty-five Representatives from the States now in rebellion, and twenty-two Senators, claiming admission, and, upon the theory of the honorable gentleman, entitled to admission beyond the power of argument to resist it; for peace will have been restored, there will be no armed power but that of the United States; there will be quiet, and votes will be polled under the existing laws of the State, in the gentleman's view. Are you ready to accept that consequence? For if they come to the door of the House they will cross the threshold of the House, and any gentleman who does not know that, or who is so weak or so wild as to suppose that any declaratory resolution adopted by both Houses as a condition precedent can stop that flood, had better put his puny hands across the flood of the flowing Mississippi and say that it shall not enter the Gulf of Mexico.

There are things, gentlemen, that are possible at one time and not possible at another. You can now prevent the rise of the flood, but when it is up you cannot stop it. If gentlemen are in favor of meeting that state of things, then do as has been already so distinctly intimated in the course of this debate, vote against this bill in all its aspects; leave the door wide open; let "our brethren of the South," whose bayonets are now pointed at our brothers' hearts, drop their arms, put on the seemingly garb of peace, go through the forms of an election, and assert the triumph of their beaten faction under the forms of political authority after the sword has decided against them. I am no prophet, but that is the history of next December if this bill be defeated; and I expect it not to become a law.

But suppose the other course to be pursued; suppose the President sees fit to do what there is not the least reason to suppose that he desires to do; suppose that after he has destroyed the armies in the field he should go further, and do, as I think he ought to do, what the judgment of this country dictates, treat those who hold power in the South as rebels and not as governors or legislators; disperse them from the halls of legislation, expel them from executive mansions, strip them of the emblems of authority, and set to work to hunt out the plant and supple "Union men," so called, who have cringed before the storm, but who will be willing to govern their fellow-citizens under the protection of United States bayonets; suppose that the fruitful example of Louisiana shall spread like a mist over all the rest of the southern country, and that Representatives like what Louisiana has sent here, with such a backing of votes as she has given, shall appear here at the doors of this Hall; whose representatives are they? I do not mean to speak of the gentlemen now here from Louisiana in their individual character, but in their political relations to their constituency. Whose representatives are they? In Louisiana they are the representatives of the bayonets of General Banks and the will of the President, as expressed in his secret letter to General Banks. If you admit such representatives, you must admit, on the same basis and under the same influences, Representatives from every State from Texas to Virginia; the common council at Alexandria—which has just sent two Senators to the other House and has ratified the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery in all the rest of Virginia, where none of them dare put his portly person—would be entitled to send ten Representatives here and two Senators to speak for the indomitable "Old Dominion." If the rebel Representatives are not here in December next you will have here servile tools of the Executive who will embarrass your legislation, humble your Congress, degrade the name of republican government for two years, and then the natural majority of the South, rising indignantly against that humiliating insult, will swamp you here with rebel Representatives and be your masters. These are their alternatives, and there is no middle ground.

To meet that state of the case, the honorable gentleman, who so ably heads the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WILSON] has proposed a declaratory resolution, and that is all—a declaratory resolution, with no provisions of law to execute it, with no power to arrest the flood at our door, a very bubble born amid the hubbub of the waters and floating with the flood—that Senators and Representatives shall not be received from any State heretofore declared in rebellion until a joint act or resolution of Congress shall have declared that they have organized a new government.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland what there is in the bill which he is now advocating to prevent the House of Representatives or the Senate from admitting members or Senators from those States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Nothing; nothing. This House is the ultimate judge of who is elected, and can always determine for itself, and therefore the resolution of the honorable gentleman is waste paper.

Mr. WILSON. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Suppose that notwithstanding the provisions of this bill, the people, loyal or disloyal, as the case may be, or both combined, should, within the limits of any insurrectionary State, organize what they would call a local State government, and in pursuance of the constitution and laws adopted by them send Representatives and Senators to Congress; what is there in this bill, or what power would the President have, to prevent this House and the Senate from admitting the persons so elected?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If they have elected their Representatives, there is no power anywhere to prevent this House from admitting them, if they see fit to do it.

I hope I answer the gentleman intelligibly. But if such an election is held anywhere in any such State it is an assertion of sovereign power without authority of law—it is rebellion itself; and this bill directs the President to disperse the electors and prevent the election being held. If this law should be passed, and the President should sanction such an election, it would be an impeachable offense; and if he did not sanction it the question would never be here to trouble us. I trust I have answered the gentleman intelligibly.

Now, a word upon the criticisms upon this bill and I have done. Provisional governors are to be appointed. That is a point of objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT], who first spoke. Why, such governors are appointed now without law, and all we propose is that they shall be under the responsibility of law and subject to the control and confirmation of the Senate. Provisional governors illegally appointed, and judges of provisional courts unknown to the law, and whose appointments have never been submitted to the Senate, are now usurping authority in Louisiana. The very landmarks of the law are swept from the land. My effort is to restore them, and to that the gentleman objects.

Why, sir, suppose this bill be not passed; suppose this machinery be as objectionable as the gentleman supposes; what is the alternative? The President remains in power with no law to guide him. I am attempting to lay down a law for his guidance. The gentlemen prefer arbitrary will to a written law, and they cannot avoid that statement of the issue.

Sir, when I came into Congress ten years ago, this was a Government of law. I have lived to see it a Government of personal will. Congress has dwindled from a power to dictate law and the policy of the Government to a commission to audit accounts and to appropriate moneys to enable the Executive to execute his will and not ours. I would stop at the boundaries of law. When I look around for them I seem to be in a waste; they are as clean gone as the division fences of Virginia estates from here to the Rapidan.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said yesterday that by this bill we are reviving the hateful black laws of the South. I drew the section that refers to that subject, and I am content to take upon my shoulders all the responsibility connected with the revival of all the laws that are revived by the bill which I had the honor at the last session to report, which both Houses of Congress approved by their votes, and which to-day I am here to maintain. I took some credit to myself for putting in a brief space the shortest possible declaration that all men should be equal before the law, when I drew the clause declaring that no law which recognizes the right to hold men in involuntary servitude shall be recognized, and that the laws for the trial and punishment of white persons shall apply to the trial and punishment of all persons whatever.

I had ignorantly supposed that if the negro had to be tried by the same court, under the same law, upon the same evidence, for the same crime, for no other crime, upon no other evidence, and by no other tribunal, I had come, in those words, as near annihilating the black laws of the South as gentlemen could have done if they had spent tomes in writing out the provision for that purpose.

But in order to meet the refined criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] upon this bill, my friend from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] and myself put our heads together, and after great contortions of the brain we thought we might possibly make the effectiveness of the law visible to gentlemen whose eyes had failed to discover the difficulties of the law of the last session, by inserting before the words "trial and punishment" the word "government." And as "government" means the provisions and execution of the law which defines the rights of persons and property, and the responsibility of men to the law, I take it that the gentleman will withdraw that objection now, and vote for the bill, because it does effectually, even to his satisfaction, annul the laws to which he has objected.

But says the gentleman [Mr. DAWES] who spoke yesterday, and the one who spoke several days ago, [Mr. ELIOT], "There is no time fixed within which the provisional governor must call upon the people to elect whether they will organize a State government or not." Certainly not. Nor can there be any. It is necessarily left to the judgment of those whom we charge with the execution of the law. If the President shall appoint provisional governors who will not execute his bidding nor take his word for it that the rebellion is suppressed, and that the people have sufficiently returned to their allegiance, then there is no remedy except to change the President, and that remedy I fear is impracticable. I take the men I find in power; the men who must execute all the laws we pass, if they be executed at all. But the real grievance is not expressed. I prescribe a rule; and it is my imposing any rule that is the offense, and not the execution of it, nor any doubt about its meaning, still less the uncertainty of its beginning. There is no uncertainty. The bill says that there shall be no government organized until armed resistance is suppressed and the people have sufficiently returned to their allegiance, the test of which is to be that a majority of the people have taken the simple oath to support the Constitution of the United States. But there are those who would have one tenth of the people govern all the people. There are those who would organize into oligarchies, like the common council of Alexandria, to suck the blood of great States, degrade the character and exasperate the temper of the people of proud Commonwealths, and send their tools here to legislate for my constituents.

Sir, my successor may vote as he pleases. But when I leave this Hall there shall be no vote from the third congressional district of Maryland that recognizes anything but the body and mass of the people of any State as entitled to govern them, and to govern the people that I represent. And they who may wish to substitute one tenth, or any other fractional minority, for that great power of the people to govern, may take, and shall take, the odium. Ay! I shall brand it upon them that in the middle of the nineteenth century, in the only free Republic that the world knows, where alone the principles of popular government are the rules of authority, they have gone to the dark ages for their models, reviving the wretched examples of the most odious Governments the world has ever seen, and propose to stain the national triumph by creating a wretched, low, vulgar, corrupt, and cowardly oligarchy to govern the freemen of the United States—the national arms to guaranty and enforce their oppressions. Not by my vote, sir; not by my vote!

If the majority of the people will not recognize the authority of the Constitution of the United States, what does the gentleman say who proposes these declaratory resolutions? That they shall come here without it? No, sir; but I would govern them for a thousand years first by the supreme authority of the Constitution which they have defied and will not acknowledge. And govern them how? Not by the uncontrolled will of this or any other President that ever lived, George Washington included. I would govern them by the laws that in the hours of their sanity they enacted, unaltered excepting so far as the progress of events require that they should be altered; to the extent that we have proposed to alter them in our bill, and no further. I leave their own rules for their government, make the President appoint, under his official and public responsibility, the officers who are to execute them; and if they do not like to be governed in that way, let us trust that the prodigal will come one day to his senses, and humbly kneeling before the Constitution that he has vainly defied, swear before Almighty God that he will again be true to it.

That is my remedy for the grievance. That is what we propose. It is for this House to say whether it prefers arbitrary discretion or legal rule; whether it prefers that anarchy shall reign or that law shall be supreme; whether it prefers that we shall be overrun by men who do not recognize the Government and who yet insist on taking part in our legislation, or whether it will erect a barrier now, at this time, to prevent the question being forced on our successors, who, wiser it may be, firmer, better republicans than we, will, from the mere fact of the pressure of the times and the clamor of the day, be absolutely incompetent to deal with these things which we now, before the event, can calmly and deliberately adjudicate. Sir, I have done.

The question was first on Mr. HOLMAN's motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 64, not voting 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Floyd, William G. Brown, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Eden, Edgerlon, Eldridge, English, Finck, Gauson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hubbard, Hutchins, Julian, Kallfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Pike, Pomerooy, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Swett, Thomas, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whately, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Branderage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, John B. Rice, Smithers, Starr, Thayer, Upson, Williams, Wilson, Woodbridge, and Worthington—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Frank, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, McDowell, McIntosh, Middleton, John O'Neill, Perry, Robinson, Scott, Spalding, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—27.

So the bill and amendments were laid on the table.

Mr. CRAVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. UPSON called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS, of Maryland, and DAWSON, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-three, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 57, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Boyd, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Coffroth, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Thayer, Upson, Williams, Wilson, and Worthington—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Blair, Brooks, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Frank, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, McDowell, McIntosh, Middleton, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Spalding, Sweat, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—33.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER. Reports from the Committee of Elections are in order, under the order of the House, during the remainder of this day.

Mr. DAWES. I am laboring under hoarseness to-day, and I do not propose to call up the election cases at this time.

ASSAULT ON HON. W. D. KELLEY.

Mr. BEAMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to call up the report of the select committee to investigate the assault upon Hon. W. D. KELLEY. As the report is very brief, and as many members have not had an opportunity to examine it, I ask that it be read, together with the resolutions appended.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The select committee raised by resolution of the House of the 23d ultimo, in which it is alleged that "it is understood that on the evening of Friday, the 20th instant, A. P. Field, a citizen of Louisiana, did attempt, by language of intimidation and bullying, to deter WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative in this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a member of Congress and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation; and did follow up the said attempt at intimidation and bullying by an assault upon the person of the said Representative KELLEY, thus committing a breach of the privilege of this House; and by which it is directed that an inquiry be made into the said alleged breach of privilege; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses, and that the committee report as soon as possible all the facts and circumstances of the affair, and what order, if any, it is proper for this House to take for the vindication of its privilege and right and duty of free legislation and judgment," report:

That your committee proceeded to take the testimony of several witnesses touching the subject-matter of said resolution in the presence of the said A. P. Field, many of whom were produced by said Field, and all of whom were subject to his examination or cross-examination. The committee also received the voluntary statement of said Field, which said testimony and statement accompany this report.

From the facts and circumstances thus elicited it appears that on the evening of Friday, the 20th ultimo, about the time of eleven o'clock, Mr. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative of this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, with several of his friends, was at tea at Willard's hotel, in this city; that Mr. Field sat at the same table with them, and that other gentlemen and many ladies were also present; that while Mr. KELLEY was engaged in conversation with his friends, Mr. Field, some what abruptly and in a loud and offensive tone of voice, interrupted him by saying, "Judge, why do you keep us out in the cold? Why don't you admit us?" That Mr. KELLEY, after a little hesitation, responded by saying, "Judge, I have nothing to do with your case; it is in the hands of the committee, and has not yet come before the House. I cannot have anything to do with it until it comes before the House;" and then resumed conversation with his friends. Mr. Field then addressed Mr. KELLEY as follows: "Why don't you march up to the line and toe the mark? Why don't you show your hand?" Mr. KELLEY continued, without any reply, to converse with his friends, until after a little time Mr. Field repeated the interrogatories last mentioned; whereupon Mr. KELLEY said, "Judge, if you will inquire of gentlemen who know me, you will find that it is my habit to march right up to the line and to toe the mark, regardless of consequences;" and then turned to listen to the conversation of his friends. Mr. Field then broke out with more violent and profane language, and said to Judge KELLEY that "he did not dare face his constituents;" that "he did not dare go home like an honest man;" that "he quailed before them after having acted as he had done or was doing." To this Mr. KELLEY replied, in a low and subdued tone of voice, "Judge Field, my constituents will not rebuke me for excluding from Congress a man who behaves as you do—a man like you—one who behaves in the presence of ladies as you are now doing." Mr. Field then rose from his seat, "seemed" to approach Mr. KELLEY, swearing that he (KELLEY) "must take that back;" exclaimed, "G—d—n you, sir, a man like me—a man like me! Come to the hall!" and then passed out into the hall, uttering, as he moved along, "You will feel me when you do come to the hall."

It further appears that after the lapse of about twenty minutes from the time at which Mr. Field went out, Mr. KELLEY, with his friends, rose from the table and proceeded to the hall; that as soon as he reached the hall Mr. Field advanced with rapid steps toward him, having his right hand in his pocket or "close to his body," and seizing Mr. KELLEY with the left hand by the collar of his overcoat, whirling him around, and exclaiming at the same time, "G—d—n you, you must give me satisfaction," struck him on the left hand with a pocket-knife, producing a serious wound. In the mean time Mr. KELLEY, having seized his antagonist by the collar of his coat, held him, saying "You are too old a man for me to strike—go away—go away peaceably." Mr. Field attempted again to strike, and continued to struggle and make threats until the bystanders took hold of the parties, and they were separated. That after their separation Mr. Field, with words of profanity exclaimed, "I will shoot him before I go to bed." He declared "that he was armed;" and again he said "he was armed, and would punish Judge KELLEY before he went away."

It further appears from the testimony that for some days before the collision between the parties, and during which time Mr. Field was entirely free from artificial excitement, he seemed to have the impression that Mr. KELLEY was an obstacle in the way of his admission to a seat in the House. He said "that the only man in his way was Judge KELLEY;" "He indulged in some severe remarks about Judge KELLEY's position;" "He spoke of Judge KELLEY rather contemptuously;" "He said he had no doubt he should succeed if it were not for Judge KELLEY;" "He manifested a great deal of bitterness."

It is proper here to state that Mr. Field does not deny the substantial facts in the case as hereinbefore stated. On the contrary, he says, "I have no doubt that all of Judge KELLEY's statements are correct, as he recollects the facts;" but he claims he "was at the time laboring under much excitement;" and says "I do protest before you to-day, with an assurance that comes from the sincerity of my heart, that I was the farthest from my intention to have attempted to exercise, by any threats of intimidations or bullying, any undue influence over the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania;" and the evidence taken by your committee seems to show that, during some days previous to the assault upon Mr. KELLEY, Mr. Field was suffering from depression of spirits, and some excitement of the nervous system, and it is believed, in view of the evidence, that at the time of the assault he was to some degree under the influence of ardent spirits. Testimony was also produced to show the peaceable disposition of Mr. Field when free from intoxication, and that he was "a gentleman of correct deportment, kind and amiable in his intercourse with others, unexceptionable in his demeanor, except on occasions of indulgence in conviviality, which utterly unfit him for association with the world." A witness says, "When he does drink, he is what I regard as an insane man."

The foregoing statement contains, substantially, the "facts and circumstances of the affair;" as found by your committee. The conduct of Mr. KELLEY throughout the entire transaction was unblamable, and the difficulty on his part was wholly unprovoked. They are satisfied by the evidence that at the time of the assault Mr. Field was to some degree intoxicated by drink; but however this fact, which is in itself an offense, may be regarded as a circumstance of explanation, they cannot deem it an excuse for the commission of misdemeanor and a violation of the privilege of the House. The fact is not to be overlooked that for some time previous to the commission of the offense, and when the mind of the respondent was unclouded by artificial stimulants, he looked upon Mr. KELLEY with some asperity, as an obstacle in the way of obtaining his seat. His language of intimidation and threats just preceding the assault had direct and unmistakable reference to "a pending subject of legislation;" and though intoxication might have had some and even the principal agency in giving form and direction to his intent, nevertheless, in the opinion of your committee, that intention, by whatever cause induced, existed, provoked the language employed, and led to the subsequent assault.

Your committee find that the said A. P. Field is amenable to the charge alleged in said resolution, and that he has committed a breach of the privilege of the House.

They recommend the adoption of the following resolutions, and ask to be discharged from a further consideration of the subject:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of A. P. Field, convicted of a breach of the privilege of the House in the attempt, by language of intimidation and bullying, to deter WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative in this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a member of Congress, and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation; and in following up the said attempt at intimidation and bullying by an assault upon the person of the said Representative KELLEY, and forthwith bring him to the bar of the House, and that thereupon said A. P. Field be reprimanded by the Speaker.

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 5th day of December last granting the privilege of the Hall to the claimants for seats from the State of Louisiana as applies to the said A. P. Field be rescinded.

F. C. BEAMAN,
E. H. ROLLINS,
JOHN D. BALDWIN.

Mr. BEAMAN. I now call the previous question. If this call should be sustained, I will then yield a portion of the time to which I will be entitled to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] my colleague on the committee, who, I understand, desires to make some suggestions on this subject.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to call for the reading of a portion of the report?

The SPEAKER. The report has just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. COX. I mean a portion that has not been read.

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. COX. Does the Speaker rule that I have not the right to call for the reading of a letter of Judge Field contained in this report?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman were entitled to the floor he could have the whole report read during his hour; but not being entitled to the floor he has no right to call for the reading of any part of it.

Mr. COX. Was the report read awhile ago as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN?]

The SPEAKER. It was.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BEAMS. I now yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, my colleague on the committee, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROBINSON,] expected to address the House on this subject, but he was unavoidably called away. Coinciding, as I do, in his views, the duty devolves upon me; and as I am hardly prepared for the occasion I must ask the indulgence of the House in my attempt to state the views which influence my colleague and myself.

I do not know that there was any difference in the committee in reference to the facts connected with the assault upon the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania; but there was a difference, and my colleague and myself held it to be a vital one, in determining the question now before the House. The first resolution reported by the committee recites that A. P. Field has been "convicted of a breach of the privilege of the House in the attempt, by language of intimidation and bullying, to deter WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative in this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a member of Congress, and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation."

Upon this portion of the report my colleague and myself found occasion to differ with the other members of the committee. It is hardly to be presumed, Mr. Speaker, that a gentleman of the age and experience of Mr. Field would have selected such a time and used such means to accomplish his purpose; certainly not at a table surrounded by ladies; certainly not in the presence of two members of the House, to whom his conduct was apparent, and whose votes would necessarily be recorded against him; certainly not by any attempt to inflict serious personal injury on the Representative from Pennsylvania. I think, therefore, it must be evident to the House that if Mr. Field had been in possession of his right mind, and if his purpose had been such as is charged in the resolution, he would not have taken such an occasion or used such means.

In order to confirm this impression, I will read the testimony of Colonel Clark, on the staff of General Banks, a gentleman who had known Mr. Field in Louisiana, who had been in his company on repeated occasions, and had opportunities to judge of his character and habits. He testified as follows:

"On Thursday I thought he was not in a condition to be left alone a moment. I advised his friends, and it was understood that he was not to be left alone. The judge promised me himself that he would not leave his room. On Friday he made the same promise, and I was with him from the early part of the evening until half past eleven o'clock. He was much excited; his mind was much disturbed, and at times I considered him to be delirious and crazy man. At some moments he seemed to be conscious of his condition, and begged me not to leave him alone. I told him that I would not leave him alone. I was that evening with Mr. Wells. The judge said he was sick, and that he did not know what he would do, or was doing. He sent a message to his particular friend, saying that he was not to leave his room, and for him to come and see him, telling him that he was sick. I ascertained during the evening that he had not left his room during the day. He said that he had not left his room. At half past eleven I made an arrangement with Mr. Wells to stay with him, as I was going to bed, not feeling very well. I went to bed, and next morning found that this difficulty had occurred some twenty minutes after I had left him. He spoke of Judge KELLEY several times during the evening, showing no malice, no feeling, making no threats, but only saying that he would answer his arguments on the floor. During the conversation he declared that he had never carried arms during his life, but that some people thought he was armed."

I allude to this evidence, Mr. Speaker, to prove from the opinions of a highly intelligent and competent witness that he left Judge Field in bed too unwell to be left alone, in a highly excited condition, made arrangement with a friend to remain with him, as he supposed, this being eleven o'clock at night; it was after this time that the unfortunate occurrence took place.

I hold, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the fact that Judge Field was not in a condition to be held responsible for his acts at that time, that the case is partially removed from the jurisdiction of the House; for it will not be supposed that we are to take cognizance, as members, of what transpires outside of this House unless it can be proved that the action of a person is with the purpose and determination to interfere or embarrass a member in the fearless exercise of his rights. As I hold political opinions at variance with the gentleman claiming a seat, I feel less reluctance in expressing myself as I do; and I am actuated solely by a desire to perform what I consider my duty to the gentleman and to my own views of the case. I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that in this imperfect attempt I have convinced the House that this is one of those unfortunate occurrences which may happen at any time, and that as the gentleman has made every reparation in his power, the House will adopt the following resolutions as a substitute for that of the committee:

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of A. P. Field, and forthwith bring him to the bar of the House; and that thereupon the said A. P. Field be reprimanded by the Speaker.

Resolved, That the suspension of the privileges of the floor, as regards the said A. P. Field, be continued until further action of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of Mr. Field to Mr. KELLEY.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 23, 1865.

Hon. W. D. KELLEY:

The occurrences between us at Willard's on the evening of the 20th instant I am sure are more deeply regretted by me than they can be by you or any other person.

I was at the time laboring under much excitement, and have but very little recollection of what transpired. I only know that I had the impression that you intended to insult me, and this was no doubt a misapprehension on my part. I am very conscious that I entertained no feelings of unkindness toward you, and no thought of attempting in any way to interfere with your official duties or to hold you to answer to me for the manner in which you discharged them, and deeply regret that I was betrayed into any rudeness or incivility of conduct toward you.

Satisfied that I am blamable in the affair, I feel it due to myself, as well as to you, to offer this explanation, which is the best reparation in my power to make.

With high respect, your obedient servant,

A. P. FIELD.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to say that that letter was not sent to my colleague until the following Thursday, five days afterward.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That appears in the evidence; but it was not until some days afterward that Mr. Field was able to be out, and in fact this was written at Mr. Field's dictation by a friend, Mr. Field being too unwell to write himself.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It was not received until after this committee was raised.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for ten minutes.

Mr. BEAMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have read the evidence which the committee has reported in this case; and while I have no desire to justify the conduct of the gentleman now arraigned before this House, I cannot assent to the conclusion at which the committee has arrived. I say to the members of the House that if they will read the testimony they will find that this man who is now arraigned or to be arraigned, has, for a long series of years, won for himself by honorable conduct the reputation of a high-minded gentleman.

At the time of this unfortunate occurrence, and unfortunate occurrences arise in every man's life, he was surrounded by circumstances over which, for the time being, he had no control. In the evidence before you, gentlemen, who are to pass upon this man's rights, and the punishment to be administered to him, it is fixed, and conclusively established, that by the use of intoxicating liquors, which is only occasional in his experience, reason was entirely overpowered and overthrown. And there is but one question in my mind that this House should pass upon and determine. We are not called upon as a jury to pass upon the guilt or innocence of the accused. We are not to say whether he has violated a provision of the criminal law; but we are to say, as the Representatives of the people, whether he has interfered with the privileges of a member of this House.

A brief statement of this occurrence is as follows: this man, with reason tottering and destroyed, as the evidence shows, met the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania at a public table. This man, the evidence in the case establishes beyond a question, when guided and controlled by that reason with which nature endowed him is a high-toned and honorable gentleman. Reason tottering, as it was, he was guilty, admittedly, of a violation of the criminal law. We are not to administer punishment for such a violation. We have but one duty to perform. If he has interfered with the privilege of a member of this House, then we are to punish, but not otherwise. But let me ask, without the least feeling one way or the other, because every feeling I have is one of kindness and liberality, let me ask the gentlemen of this House to read the answer which was given by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania to a question submitted by Mr. Field, of Louisiana. It will be found on page 2 of the report:

"To this Mr. KELLEY replied, in a low and subdued tone of voice, 'Judge Field, my constituents will not rebuke me for excluding from Congress a man who behaves as you do—a man like you—one who behaves in the presence of ladies as you are now doing.'"

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from New York will refer to the evidence, he will find that there is a slight mistake in the report.

Mr. NELSON. I would not under any circumstances do the gentleman injustice. But I find the substance of the evidence here collected by the gentlemen of the committee, and I must presume that they have reported it correctly.

But I desire to say one thing more; and that is, did the subsequent conduct of the gentleman from Pennsylvania justify the remark which the committee says he made? As a public officer and as a Representative in this House, he had no right, under any circumstances, in any way or for any reason to pass upon the rights of the gentleman from Louisiana to a seat in this House, for reason of conduct before election, or by reason of conduct subsequent to the time of election. In the letter which the gentleman from Louisiana submitted, he tells us that feeling injured and wounded by the statement made by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, he went further than the law or those rules which guide and govern organized society would justify.

Now, sir, I suggest that in this case there is nothing to be found that shows that the gentleman from Louisiana had the least idea of encroaching upon the rights or privileges of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. I suggest a careful reading of this evidence. Clearly and beyond question there was a violation of the criminal law, and to the criminal law the gentleman from Louisiana must answer. This is an extraordinary proceeding. The rules of this House in the protection of its members go to an extent somewhat doubtful, some say; and some say well defined. But in the remark the gentleman from Pennsylvania made, that his constituents would justify him in excluding this Representative, not because he was not elected in due form of law, not because he was not entitled to a seat, but simply for his recent conduct at a public table subsequent to the election, in my humble judgment, is a violation of the privileges of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The attack of Mr. Field upon the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely unjustifiable in the law, and the law officers, in the administration of the criminal law, will deal out even-handed justice, with blinded eyes, between the people on one side and the gentleman from Louisiana on the other. I, for one, am disposed to be extremely careful in our action, in extending a doubtful power which we here possess under the form of a question of privilege. Here, then, was a violation of law. It is one to be punished by the criminal courts. In the evidence taken by the committee there appears nothing that indicates a desire on the part of Mr. Field to interfere with the vote of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania upon the question that he is to determine hereafter.

One thing further. It is suggested in this report that Mr. Field thought that Mr. KELLEY was a block in his way to a seat in this House, and the committee consider that important in determining the intent Mr. Field had at the time he committed this breach of law. Now, Mr. Speaker, is there anything in that that determines the question that is important here, and the only one that is important? Did Mr. Field attempt to overawe the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania in the action he should take in this House? If he did he should be convicted by the House. If he did not, and has merely been guilty of a breach of the criminal laws, he should not be convicted here, but in the criminal courts of the country.

Mr. BEAMAN. I do not propose on this occasion to put myself into the position of a public prosecutor. I should have been better pleased had the House seen fit to confine the duty of the committee simply to an investigation and report of the facts and circumstances of the case. But the House saw fit to do otherwise. The committee were instructed not only to report the facts and circumstances, but they were also required to report what order should be taken, if any, for the vindication of the privilege of the House. Having discharged that duty, I desire now to say no more than may be necessary to vindicate the action of the committee.

Now, sir, the evidence taken in the case is full and minute, and its examination will show that an offense has been committed. This is not denied; indeed it is conceded by the respondent himself; and I understand that my colleague, who did not agree precisely in all particulars with the majority of the committee, admits that an offense has been committed. If I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] correctly, he agrees that the facts set forth in the report are substantially true, though he differs somewhat in regard to the propriety of the resolutions.

What, then, is the case as it stands before the House? There has been an assault committed upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] such an assault as might have produced death but for the intervention of third parties. This assault was preceded by violent and offensive language, or, as the resolution expresses it, by language of bullying and intimidation. Such manifestly is the case before the House. The question then arises, what is the duty of the House under the circumstances?

We are told by the gentleman from New York that although the facts are as stated; although an assault has been committed; although the language of "bullying" has been used; although threats and intimidation have been employed; we are told, nevertheless, by my colleague on the committee—the gentleman from New York—that after all there was no intention on the part of the respondent to commit any offense upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any offense against the privilege of this House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the gentleman from Michigan is mistaken when he says that it is conceded that there was an attempt at intimidation and bullying. I took particular pains to deny that fact.

Mr. BEAMAN. Very well. The language such as I have indicated was used beyond a doubt. Now let us see if there was any such attempt. The respondent goes to a table where Mr. KELLEY was sitting with his friends. He addresses him abruptly and in an offensive manner. He says, "Why do you keep us out in the cold?" He adds violent, insolent, and profane language. Such is the language of bullying. He told Mr. KELLEY that "he did not dare face his constituents;" that "he did not dare go home like an honest man;" that "he quailed before them after having acted as he had done or was doing." That was the language of intimidation, obviously intended, if it had any meaning, to affect the action of Mr. KELLEY on a pending subject of legislation, and to impress him with the conviction that he must change his course or receive the condemnation of his constituents. It was in the nature of a threat of evil to fall upon him unless he should change his course of action.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to all lawyers of this House, to all men of common understanding, whether such language does not sustain the charge of "bullying" and intimidation? He tells Mr. KELLEY that he dares not face his constituents after what he has done; that he will quail before them. Is not that an attempt to change the course of Mr. KELLEY; to warn him of what was in store for him at the hands of his constituents if he continued to oppose the admission of Mr. Field? If that was not his motive what purpose had he to accomplish?

Mr. GANSON. I wish to put one question to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BEAMAN. Not now, sir. The next question that arises is, was there any motive in fact for the conduct of Mr. Field? My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] says that he was in such a condition as not to know what he was doing; that therefore there could be no inducement for his violent language and action, and that for the time being he was irresponsible for his acts.

The question of motive sometimes becomes material in considering this class of cases. In criminal investigations, and especially when there is doubt as to the fact, the motive often becomes a material question for inquiry. Was there, could there be any motive here?

Let us look at the testimony of Colonel White. He testifies that he conversed with Mr. Field on the day before the difficulty occurred, and he says at that time:

"He was perfectly sober and correct. I commenced conversation with him about matters in his own State, and that led to a conversation from which I learned for the first time that he had been sent here as a member of Congress. I asked him what his prospects were, and he said he thought his admission was very doubtful. He then went on to say that the only man in his way was Judge KELLEY, of my State. He indulged in some severe remark about Judge KELLEY's position, regretting it exceedingly, but at the same time paying Judge KELLEY a very high compliment in regard to his ability and talent. I do not really remember anything Colonel Field said, or anything he said against Judge KELLEY.

"133. Do you say that at that time he appeared perfectly sober?"

"Perfectly, and I thought him very gentlemanly in his manners."

In another place he says:

"He spoke of Judge KELLEY rather contemptuously; he said he had no doubt he should succeed if it were not for Judge KELLEY, or some remark of that sort."

In another place he is asked, "Did he manifest a good deal of bitterness?" and he answers, "I think he did."

The House will observe that at the time of this conversation the respondent was entirely sober; and it is apparent that at that time he had a strong feeling against the member from Pennsylvania. It is clear that he regarded him as being in his way, as an obstacle in the way of his admission to a seat in this House. We can see, therefore, that at least there might have been a motive for commencing the attack.

But we are told that the respondent was intoxicated at the time of the difficulty. Grant that he was; is intoxication an excuse for the commission of offenses? May a man get drunk in order to shield himself from the crime of killing his wife? If a man wants to get rid of one of his neighbors, may he by getting drunk put himself in such a position as not to be responsible for his unlawful acts? But is it true that the respondent did not know what he was doing? He knew the member from Pennsylvania. He knew that he was making an application for a seat in this House. He knew, or assumed to know, that Mr. KELLEY was opposing him. He not only knew the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he saw him, but he knew enough, after he left the table, to go and lie in wait for him. He knew enough, and had recollection enough, when Mr. KELLEY came into the hall, to attack him. He knew enough to take a knife out of his pocket when he was approaching Mr. KELLEY, in order to strike him. He seemed to lack neither knowledge nor recollection nor purpose.

But it is said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] that the respondent has heretofore sustained a very high character, a good reputation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the question of reputation can have no bearing in a case of this kind. That question may sometimes be material in the investigation of alleged offenses. If for instance the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been wounded in the dark; if it were doubtful who committed the offense; if Mr. Field had been charged with it, and the evidence against him were not clear, testimony of previous good character might be of some importance for the purpose of raising a presumption that a man whose character had always been peaceable would not commit an offense of the nature alleged. But when there is no dispute about the principal facts, when the transaction is admitted on all hands, when it is conceded by the defendant himself that he was the man who committed the act, then from that moment his former reputation ceases to be of any earthly importance.

Now, sir, I do not desire to comment upon the testimony touching his former reputation, because it has no bearing upon the charge we are now considering. It is not a question here to-day whether Mr. Field is a loyal or disloyal man. It is not a question now before the House whether he has heretofore been a peaceable man or a riotous man. The simple question is, has he committed the alleged offense? If the House finds such to be the fact, then the only question that remains to be determined is, what shall it do in order to maintain its dignity?

The evidence is before the House, and there is no pretense on any hand that Mr. Field has not used the language, that he has not committed the violence, as stated in the report.

I have said all that I desire to offer in this case. I shall be entirely satisfied with whatever course the House may take in reference to the resolutions that the committee have reported. It seemed to the committee, however, that if there had been a breach of the privilege of the House, if the offense had been committed by the respondent as alleged, the order suggested in the resolutions was the least possible punishment that could be recommended.

Mr. COX. I ask that the vote be taken on each resolution separately; and I also move to lay the second resolution on the table. And I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] to yield to me for a few moments while I give the reasons for that motion.

Mr. BEAMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. COX. I rather think that this matter has been monstrous. I have no objection to the resolution reprimanding the honorable but refractory quasi member from Louisiana. I have no doubt the Speaker will properly reprimand him. I have no doubt it will be done with great severity, and will teach members of Congress hereafter that they ought not to get drunk.

But there is something more important involved in this question than the mere punishment of this gentleman. It involves the interests of the constituents of that gentleman, of the people of Louisiana. If Mr. Field has any constituents at all, he ought to be put in a proper position before this House to represent their interests here, or at least to represent his right to represent them. I think there is an undue severity on the part of the committee in reporting this last resolution, cutting him off from the privileges of the floor. We have already done that preliminarily. Why should we pass the resolution again, when we are about to pass upon the right of Mr. Field to a seat here?

Mr. BEAMAN. I desire to say, in answer to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] that I think he misconstrues this last resolution. The resolution is not intended to operate as a permanent exclusion of Mr. Field from this floor. It goes only to the extent of rescinding so much of the resolution as originally gave him the privileges of the floor; the intention being to allow him, if the House shall see fit, the privileges of the floor at any time when his case shall come up here.

Mr. COX. I have not misapprehended the resolution at all. It is simply rescinding the resolution allowing him to state his case here. We have already abridged him of that privilege up to this time. I propose not to continue that abridgment of his privileges, inasmuch as the Committee of Elections have reported that he is entitled to the privileges of a member here. It would be doing injustice to his constituents. From all that appears here, I think the gentleman has acted very wrongly. In the first place, it is a bad thing to get drunk.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Have you ever tried it?

Mr. COX. No, sir; I have never tried it, as the gentleman on my right [Mr. ELDRIDGE] seems to think I may have. [Laughter.]

But my remarks are directed especially to the last resolution, so that the right of the people of Louisiana shall not be impaired by this personal matter.

Mr. BEAMAN. The gentleman still seems to misapprehend the resolution. It does not go to the length of preventing any member of this House, after this resolution has been adopted, from moving to give Mr. Field the privileges of this House, especially when his case comes up.

Mr. DAWES. I trust that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] will consent that this last resolution shall be laid on the table.

Mr. BEAMAN. I have no instruction from the committee to allow anything of that kind; it is for the House to decide, and not for me.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] will withdraw the second resolution, as we are about to take a vote on the question of admitting this gentleman to all the rights and privileges of a member of this House. Let him come in here and have all the privileges of the floor before his case comes up. There is nothing so horrible in this transaction as to require or justify this continued punishment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know that I have been able to make myself sufficiently understood as to my reasons for dissenting from the report of the majority of the committee. The idea that struck my colleague and myself was that, by the course proposed by the majority, we first convict this gentleman of a very serious offense, and then inflict a mild punishment. It therefore seemed to us that the proper plan to pursue would be for the Speaker to reprimand the gentleman, and then let the subsequent action of the House determine the matter.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman how he could find it consistent with his sense of right to convict the gentleman of the offense if the plea of insanity was sustained by the evidence, as he argued it was. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not familiar with the practice of criminal courts, and therefore I am scarcely able to give the gentleman a pertinent answer.

Mr. GANSON. I understand that Mr. Field took the insanity voluntarily. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. It is a question with a good many members whether or not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was really intimidated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not himself stated that he was intimidated.

Mr. L. MYERS. I thought that I explained very fully to the gentleman from Ohio on a previous occasion this matter which he has now again put to the House; and I had hoped that he would not repeat his question. He understood from me very fully at that time, as he can understand from the evidence, if he will read it, the facts of the case. Judge KELLEY was not intimidated; the offense is the attempt to intimidate; and I trust this subject will not be treated with levity.

Mr. COX. My friend from Pennsylvania has thrown an immense weight of responsibility upon me in replying to his remarks.

Mr. L. MYERS. I am very glad to hear it. I hope the gentleman will feel the responsibility.

Mr. COX. I wish to treat this matter with proper gravity. I had not intended to make any remarks whatever. I only desired that the letter of Mr. Field should be read that this House might know that when he came to himself, when he saw what had been done, he wrote a proper letter to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. That was a letter of apology and humiliation; a letter which it was no doubt a cross to Mr. Field to write. He has been sufficiently humiliated already; in his family, among his constituents, in his State, and before the country. I propose at least to give some dignity to this proceeding by allowing him to come here, whatever he may be, and speak for the people who sent him here. Therefore I propose that the second resolution shall be laid on the table, while I have no objection to a proper reprimand of Mr. Field by the Speaker under the first resolution.

I now call the previous question.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PRUYN. I do not rise to debate the subject, but only to make a suggestion.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. A suggestion is in the nature of debate. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] objects to debate.

Mr. PRUYN. I only desire to say that, inasmuch as the Committee of Elections have reported that Mr. Field is entitled to a seat in this House, the parliamentary term "admonish" should be used in the resolution instead of the word "reprimand." Mr. Field is not now in custody.

The SPEAKER. That amendment can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRUYN. I desired to make the suggestion in order that the change in the language might be made by general consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire whether the call for the previous question has not been sustained.

The SPEAKER. It has been.

The question being on agreeing to the first resolution,

Mr. BEAMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 48, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingelsoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scoon, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—82.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kalbfleisch, King, Knapp, Law, LeBlond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Brooks, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Dawson, English, Frank, Garfield, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Norton, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Robinson, Scott, Shannon, Spaulding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Chilton A. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—52.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 5th day of December last granting the privilege of the Hall to the claimants for seats from the State of Louisiana as applies to the said A. P. Field be rescinded.

Mr. COX moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 53, nays 53.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative, and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays about the same time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THAYER. I renew it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 64, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Blow, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Ingelsoll, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, LeBlond, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Smith, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Jenckes, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scoon, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Williams, Wilder, and Worthington—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Arnold, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Dawson, Dumont, Frank, Griswold, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Lazear, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Morrison, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, Spaulding, Starr, John B. Steele, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Chilton A. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—47.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bill No. 424, to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. A. MYERS asked leave of absence for next Tuesday evening, if the House shall have a next session.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the House bill No. 678, to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft.

Mr. SCHENCK. The time for the consideration of this bill is now necessarily limited by the approach of the close of the session; and yet so great is the desire of the committee which I represent, and my own desire, that this bill shall have a proper consideration, with the opportunity to amend and modify it in the various features it presents to the House, that I will make a proposition to the House which will perhaps tend to accomplish that object, and satisfy gentlemen all around. If I cannot be gratified in this I shall be compelled to attempt to carry the bill through, under the stringent rules of the House, by the use of the previous question, which I by no means desire to resort to.

I propose to ask the unanimous consent of the House that this bill shall be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the privilege of ten minutes debate upon the various clauses of the bill; that the bill be taken up and read as an entire bill—and it is not long—with the amendments now incorporated in it as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and discuss it clause by clause.

Mr. CHANLER. I must object to any such arrangement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. CHANLER. By request of my friends I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, the proposition of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire whether this is the Senate or the House bill?

The SPEAKER. It is the House bill, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the Senate bill been reported back?

Mr. SCHENCK. It has not. The Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House after this bill was reported. This bill having been reported, the committee subsequently considered the Senate bill, and reported, as amendments to this bill, some four sections of the Senate bill which they thought ought to be included in the provisions of this bill. Those sections are eight, nine, ten, and eleven, as now numbered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it would facilitate very much the consideration of this bill, if the printed bill, amendments and all, should be considered as the pending bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I see no objection to that.

There being no objection, it was so agreed.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the first section by striking out the words "shall be subject to a fine of $100, to be collected by presentment or indictment before any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on conviction thereof by any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to pay a fine of $100;" so that the clause will read:

And shall willfully and knowingly neglect or refuse to report himself for enrollment, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof by any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to pay a fine of $100.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is an improvement of the phraseology.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend by striking out the first section after the enacting clause, as follows:

That it shall hereafter be the duty of every person who is or shall become liable to be enrolled under the provisions of the several acts to which this is an amendment, to report himself in person or by letter to the enrolling board of the district in which he resides; and any person who for ten days has been so liable to be enrolled, and shall willfully and knowingly neglect or refuse to report himself for enrollment, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction by any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction shall be sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and in default of payment of such fine he shall be punished by imprisonment for thirty days. It shall be the duty of the provost marshal of the district to report such cases of delinquency to the United States district attorney of the judicial district within which the delinquent is liable to enrollment.

In my opinion, if this bill is adopted with this section in it, it will be impossible to put it into force. In any enrollment district how many men, liable to enrollment, are working upon your railroads, in factories, on farms, who never in their whole lives read an act of Congress, and who will be liable to an indictment for a misdemeanor and to pay a fine of $100 if they are not enrolled according to the provisions of this section. It will tend not to increase the enrollment, but rather to create discontent and ill feeling more than any other provision which could be embodied in the act.

The object of the people has been declared over and over again, and their feelings in the contest in which the nation is engaged. They are determined that the rebellion shall be put down; but I wish to suggest that this large class of men liable to enrollment, and who work necessarily every day, pay no heed to the enactments of Congress, except as they are brought to their notice by the newspapers. Will this add strength to the Army, will it add to the good feeling which prevails in all the States, to provide that every man who shall willfully and knowingly neglect to enroll himself shall be liable to pay a fine? How will he prove the fact? He pleads not guilty; and you prove the fact that he has lived a certain time in the district, that he has voted, that he was previously enrolled under former acts; and as every man is presumed to know the law, there is no means by which he can escape conviction, because he cannot prove a negative, and prove that he had not read the act of Congress. Will it not, I suggest, create trouble and excitement and injustice, rather than result in any benefit?

It is suggested to me that negroes are all liable to enrollment, and they cannot read or write. That comes in as another illustration. The result will be injustice and dissatisfaction to parties who are entirely willing to bear their part in sustaining the law and making others sustain it; but for a mere neglect they ought not to be held to be guilty of crime.

Mr. SCHENCK. There would be force in the remarks made by the gentleman from New York if it were not that he overlooks, as it seems to me, although to some extent he commented upon those words, the provision in the bill that the neglect or refusal of the parties to return themselves for enrollment must be a willful and knowing neglect or refusal. It seems to me to be absolutely essential that we should go further than we have yet gone to secure a full, complete, and actual enrollment of those subject to draft. While it may be a hardship to the man subject to enrollment that he is not permitted to escape, it really is none, for every one owes personal service to the Government. In favoring one, you may be doing injustice to all the rest of the community in which he lives. While it may be the interest of the party not to perform his share of personal service, it is on the other hand the interest of every other inhabitant of the community in which he lives that every one liable shall go upon the list. I hold, therefore, that it is a matter of justice that as complete and perfect an enrollment as is possible should be obtained in every district and sub-district. Conceding that proposition, then the question arises whether we need any further legislation to enable the officers to accomplish a more perfect enrollment. I think we do, and the Committee on Military Affairs thought we did in introducing this proposition.

Mr. NELSON. I agree with the gentleman, of course, as to the object which we have in view, but could it not be reached by a provision requiring every person who knows of a person subject to enrollment who is not enrolled to give notice of that fact? Does it not strike the gentleman that there are thousands in the cities who will innocently neglect to report their names, and how will they escape conviction?

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee thought this an efficient way of compelling enrollment. It operates directly upon each individual who knows himself to be liable to the performance of this duty. It requires him, under penalties, to report himself. The gentleman says that persons may be liable to punishment for not doing so when they are perfectly innocent. I do not think he allows sufficient force to the words "knowingly and willfully," when he makes that assertion. Of course the burden of proof would be on the Government undertaking to convict a man of having failed to enroll himself when he should have done so, to show that he knew he was liable to be enrolled. It would be for the Government to show that he had a willful purpose of saving himself from enrollment before he could be subjected to the penalties provided for. That is the reason why the words "knowingly and willfully" were inserted, in order to prevent the punishment of innocent persons.

The gentleman [Mr. NELSON] has proposed a substitute for this section by a motion suggesting a different mode of proceeding. He asks why it would not do to require every person who knows of one liable to draft to report him. I think it would be very invidious to require all the community to turn informers, while we refuse to act upon the man himself whose duty it is to have himself known as liable to draft. I think it is much better to compel the man who is liable to duty to give the proper information, rather than to compel, by law, all the rest of the community to turn informers. The gentleman may move a direct provision of that kind to this section, and perhaps it may meet the sense of the House. But I very much doubt that it would answer as well the purpose, or whether it would be as just in principle as that proposed in the section.

Mr. GANSON. I move to amend the section by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "thirty;" so that it will read:

And any person who for thirty days has been so liable to be enrolled, and shall willfully and knowingly neglect or refuse to report himself for enrollment, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to a fine of $100.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] so as to suggest my view in reference to the original motion submitted by the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. NELSON.] I fear that this section, if incorporated in the bill, will make the enrollment system very offensive. It is true that no person could be convicted under the section unless the Government could show that his failure to enroll himself was willful and knowing. But every person who fails so to enroll himself will be, under the provisions of this section, liable to indictment. We must have, and doubtless will have, scores of men in every district in the country who will not be informed of what the law requires them to do; and every man who, because of that want of knowledge may fail to enroll himself will be liable to indictment, so that we will have indictments pending in the courts of the United States against persons in every neighborhood throughout the whole country. The tendency of it will be to dissatisfy the people with the system which we have adopted for filling up the Army. I think that our first care should be, inasmuch as the system itself is a hardship, to put it in such form as will render it as little burdensome to the people as possible, as palatable as possible. It is a very bitter pill to a great part of the people, and should have a sugar coat on it. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. NELSON] will prevail, and that the section will be struck out.

Mr. GANSON. I withdraw the amendment to the section.

Mr. KERNAN. I renew it. I fear that the effect of this section will not be to add to the strength of the Army or to the perfection of the enrollment. Indeed I think we will get more men in the dock and the jail than we will get in the Army. I do not believe that the performance of such a duty can be enforced by indictment and penalty. I therefore hope that the motion to strike out the section will prevail. I wish to suggest, what must have suggested itself to any gentleman who has attended our United States courts since the great number of penalties imposed by the internal revenue law, that a great number of cases will be brought before the courts with a view to make fees for the deputy marshals rather than with a view to punish offenders. I think that under this section every deputy marshal would be able to get up prosecutions and greatly increase the expense of the administration of the law. But I do not see that you will get any considerable number added to the enrollment list by this section. There will be great dissatisfaction; a great many innocent men will omit to report themselves, and I do not believe that it will remedy whatever difficulties now exist. Indeed, if the enrolling officers in the enrollment districts, which are small ones, are required to perform their duties, there will be no difficulty in getting an accurate enrollment, particularly as it is the interest of every man whose name is on the list to give information of those whose names are not down in order to lessen the chances against him.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say but few words upon this point. Of course, unless it will increase the Army without increasing the trouble of executing the law, then this is a bad section. But what are the difficulties now? I would call to the attention of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who made the point, that it would be difficult and troublesome to execute this law; that probably the most unpopular provision in the whole enrollment bill of the last summer, that which caused the most complaint, the most heart-burning among the people, was this: that when a draft was ordered in any community, and the men ran out of the way or dodged the enrollment and did not appear, so that the Government could not get hold of them, the provost marshal immediately ordered another draft. Instead of seeking out and arresting the deserter, or bringing up the drafted man who did not come when drafted, a new man was taken in his place, and the result was that honest, willing, and loyal men who remained at home and took the chances of the draft had to bear additional burdens in consequence of rascals who escaped. That made more discontent and complaint against the Government than anything else in the last draft.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat says the sub-districts are small. I remind him that the sub-divisions are of congressional districts; many of them in some parts of the country cover fifteen, sixteen, and eighteen counties, and cover a very wide range of country; and unless the law makes it obligatory for a man to report himself for enrollment it will be impossible to get an accurate enrollment. I think the section is carefully guarded, and no man need be punished unless he purposely avoids the duties imposed upon him by the law.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. I believe it is a well-settled principle of law that no man can plead ignorance of the law. I understand the argument of the gentleman to be that he can be excused if he pleads ignorance of this law, or that he does not understand it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say so. I think if anything is universally understood in this country it is that there is such a thing as a draft, and that men within certain ages are liable to the draft. No ignorance can be pleaded upon that point.

In regard to this section I would say that we might very readily have put this matter into the hands of the military authorities, and let the man not reporting himself as here required be tried by a military court. But we thought there was already too much jealousy of military courts, and we, therefore, proposed to leave the matter to be tried by the civil authorities. For my own part, I do not think there will be a dozen trials to be had in the United States under the draft if this section is adopted, and I do not believe that a very large number of the persons who now seek to escape the enrollment would report themselves, or at least not seek to keep themselves out of the way of the enrolling officer. If this is a hardship, as gentlemen say, then let us seek to make it as little of a hardship as possible.

Mr. KERNAN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. While I am inclined to believe, with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] although he seems to urge it, that it would be a severe measure to require a man to come forward voluntarily and report himself for enrollment and draft; yet I think it would be but right to punish any willful and knowing avoidance of the enrollment and draft. I therefore move to amend this first section by striking out the words "neglect or refuse to report himself for," and insert the word "avoid." So that the section will then read, "and any person who for ten days has been so liable to be enrolled, and shall willfully and knowingly avoid enrollment shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," &c. It seems to me that it is sufficient to ask of persons who are subject to draft that they shall stand still and allow the officers of the Government to look them up and enroll them, and punish them if they are guilty of any means or devices to avoid the performance of that duty on the part of the officers appointed for that purpose.

The gentleman from Ohio seemed to argue that this section would impose a penalty upon those only who willfully and knowingly seek to avoid enrollment; but that is not the reading of the section as it now stands. It seems to me that it is a severe and oppressive section, and one which there will be great difficulty in enforcing. It will in all probability lead to much litigation and to complication in the discharge of the duties of the provost marshals.

If we simply impose a penalty upon those who shall resort to any means to avoid enrollment or draft, it will be fair, and its justice will be recognized; and I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that my amendment ought to be accepted by the committee.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot accept the amendment. The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs must be acted upon as they are reported.

Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] withdraw the motion to close debate?

MR. SCHENCK. If it be not withdrawn I hope it will be voted down, so that we may discuss the question whether we are to have an efficient enrollment law.

MR. FARNSWORTH. As more extended discussion appears to be desired by many members, I withdraw the motion to close debate.

MR. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.] I do so because I am opposed to amending the section at all. I believe that it will, if adopted, operate very injuriously. I think that any further and more stringent legislation with respect to enrollment is unnecessary, and will render the law very unpopular. I have never heard of any difficulty in regard to enrollments. The difficulty, as I have understood, is that after men are enrolled they escape. It is not that they are not enrolled.

In my view no change of the law on this subject is necessary. The law which we now have is sufficiently stringent. If the people are allowed to go on as they are doing they will fill up the Army as fast as required. If this section be enacted it will, I believe, be very odious. A subsequent section, the third or the fourth, is, in my judgment, still worse. The whole bill is more tyrannical than any military system ever adopted by Austria; and I trust, therefore, that it will be rejected.

MR. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the word "avoid," the word "willfully."

I agree with the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in regard to the character of this bill. It was my intention to urge upon the House the very point which he has suggested, and for that purpose I had prepared what I deemed a suitable argument on the subject. But when, on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, debate was restricted to ten minutes, that of course precluded the possibility of my arguing the question as I desired. I do not believe that, under this limitation of debate, the real character of this bill can be adequately exposed. It is a bill whose provisions touch most nearly the social and military relations of every citizen in the United States. This very amendment brings that fact to the attention of the House. You cannot consider the subject of willful avoidance of the provisions of such a bill as this without entering into all the questions which arise under the power given to the Government officials to execute such a law. It is utterly impossible that the rights and liberties of the citizen can be secured to him so long as he is held amenable, by laws such as this, to an authority outside of the civil courts, so long as he is subjected to the arbitrary power of tribunals established for the purpose of carrying out a system utterly hostile to the institutions of this country—military tribunals before which the rights of no man are safe.

I believe that the pending section should be stricken out. I believe that the whole bill is radically and irreparably wrong. I believe it to be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill free from provisions of this despotic character, and embracing two or three simple provisions for securing a correct enrollment and preventing desertion. They are now undertaking, by this bill, to establish a system which cannot but end in the destruction of all order in the Army, and eventually bring about popular outbreaks and insurrections. I believe that it will weaken the national arms and tend to deplete the national Treasury; that it will be ineffectual with regard to the object proposed, as well as highly expensive to the local governments. I believe it to be a bill utterly hostile to every principle of a free representative Government. I believe that it can be proven to be so. I believe that the results thus far prove it. I believe it to be a bill that the records of every provost marshal will show has filled our quotas on paper and has not sent fit men to the Army. The lunatic asylum and the jail have been robbed to fill those quotas.

It is a well-known fact that from this system have arisen the very evil that this bill attempts to remedy, substitute brokerage, bounty swindling, and bounty jumping. A new guild has been created by the system of enrollment and fastened perpetually upon the people of this country.

Sir, this bill and the nature of this bill have become ingrafted upon the military system of the United States. And in order to meet this measure as it deserves, the whole question should include an examination—and the whole matter requires that examination and scrutiny—into its effect upon the military organization of the United States. I am convinced that it will be found to have been injurious in every military department. I believe that it will be found on examination to have done more to cut off the sympathy between the Government and the people of the United States than any other measure which has passed this Congress since the rebellion.

With regard to this special amendment I have to say that it will add another feature to the already innumerable contortions of justice which have been fastened upon the tribunals of the country by the enrollment acts already passed. For the purpose of correcting a special evil acknowledged in the body of the bill, even the right of trial by jury is done away with, and the people are forced to submit to a military tribunal for the adjustment of private rights. You cannot by any system, by any fair opinion of the law of the country, insist on this law. Do as you may, the sympathies of the people are against it. The spirit of your institutions is against it.

MR. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is argued, as I supposed it would be, not on the merit of the particular amendment, but on the ground of hostility to the whole section. He is opposed not only to the first section, but to the whole bill; and not only to the whole bill, but to any system which provides for bringing soldiers into the field. I am not, like my colleague on the committee from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], disposed to stop debate at the very outset, for I think this debate, in some respects, is wholesome. I think at the threshold of discussion on the subject this House should indicate its purpose to sustain or not the Military Committee in an attempt to make a law to procure men by increasing the stringency of the power of enrollment.

I was prepared to expect opposition to this section of the bill, and to the whole bill, and to the whole system, and I was prepared to expect it from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] who last addressed the House, and from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] I heard each of the speeches made by these gentlemen last session when this measure was before the House. The tyrannical course pursued in the draft was then argued at full length by the gentleman from New York, and the bill was then characterized as worse than anything ever done in Austria. I remember the figure. I recollect more than that. I recollect that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] predicted that if we passed a law repealing the commutation clause, and providing, as we did ultimately, for enforcing the draft with a little more stringency to procure men to fill the depleted ranks of our Army, it would result in resistance and bloodshed. I was then as now assured that the gentleman was not likely to prove a true prophet, and what was not a true prophecy then has not become history since. I said then that I had no fear of the people, and I repeat it. I said then, so far from producing riot, confusion, and disorder, that when the people came to understand what their Representatives had done in the endeavor to fill up the thinned ranks of the Army they would sustain them. And I ask every gentleman to bear me out in the assertion that never did a draft go on more quietly, and never were the ranks of the Army, to the extent that the draft could do it, so filled up as they were, saving the campaign of last year, under that very bill so denounced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I say now, at the very threshold of this consideration of this subject, that my thorough conviction is, so far as my own personal observation is concerned in regard to this matter, that the people are ahead of Congress, and the soldiers far ahead of either. Your soldiers call upon you to make your laws stringent; they call upon you from the field to fill up the ranks; they say there must be no skulking; they say that all persons liable to be enrolled must be enrolled; that persons liable to be drafted should be drafted; and that it is unfair that they alone should bear the burdens and be placed in the front of battle while others are shirking from taking their fair share. And the people are not far behind the soldiers in this matter. I have yet to learn that any man upon either floor of Congress is unlikely to be sustained by an intelligent constituency anywhere throughout the land for an attempt to pass efficient laws in order to fill up the ranks of the Army, to enable us to put down this accursed and damnable rebellion.

Now, sir, this section opens fairly that discussion, and I expected gentlemen to take position upon the one side or the other. This section is not that oppressive and tyrannical section which it is supposed to be. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] thinks that in any of its features it is too harsh let him offer amendments; but so far, his opposition is to the whole section; and I insist upon it that that opposition only means, as he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] frankly avow, opposition to the whole bill and the whole system. It is for the House to determine whether these gentlemen shall be allowed, in their hostility to the whole scheme of filling up our armies by a system of drafting at all, to accomplish that by defeating this section of the bill.

I have no objection, so far as the penalty is concerned, that gentlemen should modify the language, so that they leave some substantial means provided in the law for enforcing its provisions. I have no objection to having this number of days of imprisonment reduced, say from thirty to twenty, and perhaps ten; but twenty days would perhaps be the proper medium. But some penalty, some provision, something to compel a more perfect and complete and full enrollment of the citizens liable to draft, and to hold them to their duty to report themselves, and not skulk away, I believe essentially necessary as one of the features of a bill which is to be an improvement on the present enrollment law.

MR. CHANLER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and move another amendment by inserting the word "intentionally." My views upon this subject are certainly well known. They have been boldly expressed both here and elsewhere; and the difference between the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and myself, is exactly this—

MR. FARNSWORTH. As the opinions of the gentleman from New York are so well known both here and elsewhere, I suggest there is no necessity for repeating them.

MR. CHANLER. And the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois is so well known this impertinency is entirely unnecessary.

In regard to the position of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and of myself, the issue between us is exactly defined: I am in favor of increasing the Army; so is he. We only differ as to the method. I oppose this bill because I think it is not an effectual means of raising troops; he advocates it because he thinks it is. We agree upon the fact that the enrollment of the citizens may be necessary; but we differ as to the means of forcing men into the ranks; and we will differ very widely as to the character of substitutes which we will permit into the American armies. It is because of bills brought forward by that gentleman upon this floor that the American Army has been made the asylum of drunkards and lunatics. It is because it has failed as a means of enrolling and coiling out the national forces in a time like this that I oppose this bill. The system has become simply a process of bounty jumping and bounty swindling throughout the country. It demands more than the ingenuity even of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to prevent these creatures from battenning upon their fellow-citizens. And yet the gentleman proposes to place this matter in the hands of the men whom I wish to oppose here, because they have exercised the powers conceded to them tyrannically. I believe that the class of men who have been appointed as provost marshals throughout this country, with many exceptions, perhaps, but as a general rule, have been the subservient tools of the Secretary of War.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 62.

I believe that the system of centralized military power organized under this bill would sap the foundations of our Government. I believe that every effort to remedy it would but perpetuate the evil and the error inherent in this bill and the system it establishes. I make no factious opposition here. I court nothing but an open debate and consideration of this subject; and it seems to me that the chairman of the Military Committee, knowing and anticipating the position of the able chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has rather dodged a full debate. I recognize, sir, the apology which he made for limiting debate to ten minutes; but it was done with a perfect knowledge on his part of the advantage of his position under such an arrangement.

Sir, a bill of this character, involving as it does the depth and breadth of American liberty and individual rights of every American citizen, cannot be discussed section by section without the extraordinary acumen possessed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs who framed the bill, and whose knowledge of tactics has been heretofore manifested in his management of troops in the field. There is a class of distinguished soldiers who have left the field of glory for the cupola of safety, and who now make it a matter of boast that they are no longer soldiers. [Cries of "Name!" "Name!"] Sir, we might have hoped that men of this class, who have carried the rank and file of our Army into points of danger, would have better appreciated their position before the country when victory is crowning those who followed after them, and when the cannon is baying forth the victory of the soldiers they once led.

Sir, the crying evil of this whole system is based upon the very fact which has been alluded to in this debate; it is owing to the system inaugurated by the partisan leaders of this Administration, which commissions as brigadiers men who are utterly ignorant of military science and even unschooled in the knowledge of militia training, and who lead their fellow-citizens to speedy death, to the dishonor of their country.

The proper and available means of filling the ranks have been neglected and unfit and incapable officers have been allowed to act in responsible positions. The confidence of the soldier in his superior and of the citizen in his Government have been lost by the reckless practices and partisan policy of the republican leaders. We have but to take the record of the promotions to high commands from the beginning of the war to the present. It is not my object to assail individuals. The system is at fault. Let the system bear witness against those who abuse it, if it be good, or let the system be improved if the fault lie at its door. Do not perpetuate error and evil in face of the terrible array of consequences known to every one who reads.

A clear and good example of the evils of the policy of the Administration exists in the bad results produced by catering to the ambition and kindred virtues peculiar to the political swashbucklers, Bobadils, Falstaffs, Bardolphs, Nymms, and ancient Pistols; who trafficked in the military favor and prejudices of the people to secure for themselves the rank of brigadier, armed and equipped as the law directs, ignorant of tactics, swelled with the affluence that rises in the rear "of the pomp and circumstance of glorious war." The brigadier volunteers in embryo, raised zealously and well, no doubt, regiment upon regiment, which they offered to the Administration in exchange for a commission for themselves. Some, but not all of these, were generals and colonels in buckram, and never led their men into battle; others did lead their commands to distinction and extinction; or wasted the military resources of the country in a vain but crazy attempt to become heroes. Many of those have happily relinquished the sword for the gown, the pen, the plowshare, and politics. They have left the Army for the Army's good, to the true soldiers who learned their duty in the field or rose from the ranks. The influence of such men has been injurious to the service, not only among the officers, but among the men, and has been one of the prime causes of a lack of zeal among the people to enter the Army under the different calls for troops.

Let the regular establishment be filled up to its standard before this cruel system of draft is again and again resorted to. The people look with horror at its injustice. It paralyzes the energies of our mechanical, agricultural, and commercial industry, and almost depopulates certain districts of their male inhabitants.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], and am opposed to this whole bill upon the ground that there is sufficient legislation already to enroll and call out all the necessary force to put down this rebellion. Why should we now, in this time of prosperity, when the armies of the Government are successful, when the principal cities of the South are being taken into our possession, add to the despotism and tyranny of this whole enrollment or conscription act by seizing upon citizens who otherwise would not have been liable to any penalty if they did not report to the provost marshal?

Mr. SCHENCK. I make the question of order that the chairman of the committee which reported this bill should be permitted, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is always permitted on appropriation bills in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to respond to propositions to amend, and to oppose amendments offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given the floor three times to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] on this section, while the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] had not yet spoken. The Chair knows no rule by which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is to have the floor to reply to every amendment to an appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I have been mistaken as to the right of a chairman of a committee to defend the bill reported by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to defend his bill, but not to reply to every amendment. Otherwise the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would have half the debate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the Speaker, but I now raise the point of order that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is not opposing the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order. The gentleman from New Jersey must oppose the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I am opposed to the amendment—not only opposed to the amendment but to the whole bill. I am opposed to the amendment on the ground that there is no necessity for this bill at all; that we have already sufficient legislation on the subject; that there is no difficulty in filling up the Army; that the people have responded to the calls on them; and that such armies as we have have never been produced by any other nation in the civilized world. We can raise men enough by volunteering. There is enough of patriotism and of fidelity to the laws and Constitution of the country existing in the hearts of the people to respond freely and unequivocally to every call made on them for the purpose of putting down the rebellion.

I am opposed to the bill on the ground that it is despotic, that it is tyrannical, that it takes away the citizen without due process of law; that the law, as it stands, lets the President of the United States hold in his hand the lives and liberties of twenty million people. He has a right to send his provost marshals into every district in the United States and to take every citizen between the ages of twenty and forty-five, place him in the ranks, and march him by the side of the seething Ethiopian to the banks of the Mississippi, to fight the battles of the country. It is because it is degrading to the white race of America, because it saps the very foundations of liberty, because it strikes away the safeguards of life and liberty, that I protest against any further legislation of this character. The people have been ready to respond, and always have responded on every call. It has been demonstrated clearly to the mind of every reasonable man that it is unnecessary to have these absurd, tyrannical enactments further agitated by amendments or extra bills for the purpose of enforcing a power which is already sufficient in the hands of the President. There is no necessity for it at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution authorizing certain banks in the District of Columbia to accept the provisions of an act therein named.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Jersey that he must confine himself to the amendment. The point having been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], he must oppose, in good faith, the amendment of the gentleman from New York, to insert the word "intentional."

Mr. ROGERS. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that I am speaking to the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has gone very far beyond opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I will confine myself to it. If I understand this section, Mr. Speaker, it renders liable to a fine of $100 and to imprisonment for thirty days, in case of non-payment, any person liable to enrollment who neglects to send, by letter or otherwise, his name to be enrolled. It makes no difference, in the way the bill is drawn, whether the person be or be not aware of his liability.

If I understand it, the burden is laid upon the person who is to be enrolled, and not upon the Government, to show that he did not know he was liable to be enrolled. He is required to prove a negative, which no man can be supposed to be able to do. It does not lie upon the Government to show that the person knew he was liable to enrollment, but the burden of proof, contrary to all the rules of law and evidence laid down in the books from the "year books" to this time, is shifted upon the person who is charged with avoiding the enrollment. Under this bill how is a man to know that he is liable to enrollment? Is it to be supposed that every citizen knows what the act of Congress is upon this subject? There are hundreds of people in every State where laws are passed who are not aware of all the minutiae and particulars of those laws. It would be harsh indeed to say that people shall be liable to imprisonment and a fine of $100 when the fact may actually exist that they do not know they are liable to draft.

They know that heretofore it has been the business of the enrolling officer to go around to take their names; and notwithstanding you may put the law upon your statute-book that a man shall be liable to punishment who does not come forward voluntarily and give in his name for enrollment, it may be that thousands will not know that any such thing is required of them. It imposes upon the citizen an obligation under which he ought not to be placed. It makes him responsible for knowing the rule of law, when, according to the common understanding and judgment of mankind, it is not to be supposed that everybody will understand it. And when men have supposed that their names have been entered upon the enrollment list, they will after a time, while supposing that they are not liable to fine and imprisonment, find some officer coming along and picking them up, and having them indicted and imprisoned, when, so far as their own consciences are concerned, they knew not that they were guilty of any offense whatever.

The SPEAKER announced that debate on the amendment to the amendment had expired.

Mr. CHANLER withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question was on Mr. SLOAN's amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] to accept in lieu of his amendment the one which I will suggest, and which I think will accomplish the same object he has in view. I suggest the following: insert after the word "knowingly" the words "and with intent to avoid the draft."

Mr. SLOAN. I accept that amendment.

The amendment of Mr. SLOAN, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move to amend this section by inserting after the words "the several acts to which this is an amendment" the words "and who has not yet been enrolled." My object is to make this section as nearly perfect as possible, by removing all reasonable grounds for objection, and still leave it with the efficiency which, I think, a law of this kind ought to have in order to accomplish the object intended.

I hope I shall not try the patience of the House or of the Speaker when I try to manage this bill so as to accomplish that purpose. I find the following in the rules governing this House:

"No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending; in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken."

"Where an amendment is offered after a member has occupied the floor, he may again occupy the floor, the question being changed."

I was reminded a few minutes ago by the Speaker that I had spoken two or three times upon this section, and therefore, even if no one else had claimed the floor, I could not be heard. I had not spoken two or three times upon any one amendment, and the question being changed, I wanted to be heard upon the amendment to change the bill. Now, if I have been mistaken in the rules, I have been led into that mistake by observing, what everybody in the House knows, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] and his colleague on that committee who sits near him, [Mr. MORRILL], have always been heard, and heard patiently, and been given the floor in preference to others in answer to objections to the bills under their charge.

The SPEAKER. After what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has said, the Chair must be allowed to state that he has conformed to the usual practice of this House in the decision he has made. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] moved to amend the first section of this bill by inserting the word "wilfully," and upon that amendment he spoke ten minutes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was heard ten minutes in reply. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] withdrew his amendment and moved to insert the word "intentionally," and upon that amendment he spoke ten minutes. Then the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] claimed the floor, and the Chair thinks he claimed it in advance of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken to this extent in what he claims to be the practice in Committee of the Whole, when sections of appropriation bills are under consideration. The Committee of Ways and Means are first recognized to offer amendments to perfect the section. They are first entitled to the floor for that purpose. But they are not entitled, under any rule or usage known to the Chair to reply to every amendment which may be offered to any part of the appropriation bills.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Chair need not suppose that I am going to speak on every occasion and on every subject; but as to the practice in Committee of the Whole and in the House, in reference to replying to propositions to amend, I know, as every member of this House knows, what that practice has been.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MALLORY. My point of order is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is not addressing himself to any subject before the House, but is lecturing the Speaker.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; the gentleman from Ohio is defending himself.

Mr. MALLORY. I call the gentleman to order. He is now violating the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Ohio has the right, when he thinks the Chair is in error, to have the Chair construe the rules correctly, and will always recognize the right of every gentleman, when he thinks that the Chair has erred, to give the Chair the benefit of any suggestion, reserving the right to reply or to defend himself.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not wish to obtrude myself improperly upon the House or upon the Chair; but as the Chair put the objection to my answering, where a new and different amendment was offered, upon the ground that I had already occupied the floor, I felt justified in referring to what I understood to be the rule and the practice.

The SPEAKER. As this matter must go in the Globe, the gentleman having raised the point, it is proper that the Chair should state that both amendments were pro forma in their character, and were so understood in the House. The gentleman from Ohio had spoken once in reply when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] sought the floor to speak. Then the gentleman from Ohio remarked that he was entitled to the floor as chairman of the committee. That remark caught the ear of the Chair, and the Chair replied that he had already spoken three times, while the gentleman from New Jersey had not yet spoken, and therefore the floor was awarded to the latter gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wished merely to call attention to the difference in persons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have offered this amendment with the view of perfecting the bill. I find that the position of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS], like that of other gentlemen, including the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER], is one of general hostility to the bill. The arguments presented are directed against the whole system.

As to any disposition on my part to preclude proper discussion of this matter, the House will bear me witness that I have invited candid and thorough discussion, such as our limited time will allow. I have not been disposed to hurry this bill through without allowing the views of members to be heard. I appeal to the House in testimony of the fairness with which I have acted.

As to the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER]—that "soldier of the Republic" who, forgetting his chivalry, attacks another humble "soldier of the Republic"—I admit that I well understood that he had prepared a speech of an hour's length, for he so admonished the House; but I did think that it would be easier for us to take it in small doses, and that we might in that way recover sooner from the infliction. Hence I found it rather an argument in favor of the ten minutes rule that, under it, that speech would be given to us in six successive charges. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. I congratulate the gentleman upon the working of the first dose. It seems to have operated very well.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not much, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. I shall supply the gentleman with a repetition of the same dose.

Mr. SCHENCK. Having left the tented field to come to the "cupola of safety," I hope to be defended hereafter by my friends, if I am incapable of taking care of myself, from any further attacks of this nature. I did not expect to get quite so high from any help the gentleman might give me. [Laughter.]

I shall not reply to these general attacks upon the system. I shall confine myself, so far as I may be permitted under the rules to do so, to proposing such modifications as will, in my opinion, improve this or any other section of the bill. With this view, I now move to amend by inserting in the fifth line after the word "amendment" the words "and who has not yet been enrolled."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by striking out, in the fourteenth line, the word "thirty," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty," so as to reduce the term of imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODELL. I move on line seven to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to give persons twenty instead of ten days to report for enrollment. I do not think that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LE BLOND. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the propriety of striking out in line twelve the words "courts of the United States," and inserting "State courts."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That has been stricken out already.

The question recurred on striking out the entire section.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 51.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and NELSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 49.

So the first section was stricken out.

The Clerk reported the second section, as follows:

And he it further enacted, That hereafter all persons mustered into the military or naval service, whether as volunteers, substitutes, representatives, or otherwise, shall be credited to the State and to the ward, township, precinct, or other enrollment sub-district where such persons belong by actual residence, (if such persons have an actual residence,) and where such persons were or shall be enrolled, (if liable to enrollment;) and it is hereby made the duty of the Provost Marshal General to make such rules and give such instructions to the several provost marshals, boards of enrollment, and mustering officers, as shall be necessary for the faithful enforcement of the provisions of this section, to the end that fair and just credit shall be given to every section of the country.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the second section by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That in any call for troops, no county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, shall have credit except for men actually furnished on said call, or preceding call, by said county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, and mustered into the military or naval service on the quota thereof.

There were two provisions inserted in the enrollment law of last session, Mr. Speaker, which have in my judgment produced a great deal of mischief and very little good. I refer to those sections which permitted recruiting in the rebel States and the allowance of credits for previous naval enlistments. From these two sources have arisen the gigantic and wide-spread evil of filling quotas of towns without adding troops to the Army. The amendment which I have offered is designed to correct this evil, to cut it up by the roots, and to bring back recruiting to an honest, meritorious, and patriotic effort to fill the ranks of our gallant Army with men and not with the shadowy fictions which pass under the general name of "paper credits." We have witnessed with amazement the quotas of entire cities and districts, and I do not know but States also, technically filled, without adding a single man or muscle to the effective military force of the nation. How this is done, by what system of constructive credits, or fictitious credits, or fraudulent credits it has been accomplished, is a mystery which I am totally unable to solve. The fact, however, is one of general notoriety, and the evil is one which should not be allowed to exist for a single day when the correction can be applied by Congress.

And Congress, sir, is the only power that can apply the remedy! The State authorities see and appreciate the evil, but they have not sufficient jurisdiction in the premises to correct it. In the Legislature of my own State this winter there has been much discussion and excitement in regard to this matter, and a law was passed designed to abate the evil; but all State laws necessarily fall short of the object for want of proper authority. Congress, sir, and Congress alone, can remedy the evil; and unless it is speedily remedied it will end in demoralizing and debauching the whole system of enrollment and conscription, bringing it into such popular contempt, odium, and distrust, as to paralyze it as an agency for raising troops for our Army.

My amendment, sir, is very simple and very direct. It provides that no credit shall be given to any town "except for men." Ay, sir, for men! Men "actually furnished by said town;" and not "actually furnished" only, but "mustered into the service on the quota of said town." It does not require that the men shall be citizens or residents of the town for which they enlist, but leaves the law on that point unchanged, the object being simply to require that men shall be furnished when men are called for. Sir, if this simple rule had been adhered to we should have had full ranks in our Army to-day, and the towns could have procured the "men" for little if any more than they have paid for these worthless "paper credits." Conscription after conscription, draft after draft, must ensue, if the Government fails in getting men; and it thus happens that this constructive mode of filling quotas reacts upon and severely punishes the very towns and districts that seem to derive a temporary advantage therefrom. Sooner or later, the men must come, and one man in good season often removes the necessity of raising five men at a later and less favorable juncture of military affairs. So that the policy, besides being disastrous to the Government, is equally disastrous to the towns, even when viewed from the stand-point of local interest, local jealousy, and self-preservation. I repeat, sir, it is a policy that saves one man to-day only to conscript five men to-morrow.

When it was originally resolved to allow credits for men in the naval service I thought some advantage might accrue to my own State in having her quota for the military service lessened thereby. I knew that Maine had contributed a large number of volunteers to the Navy; very large in proportion to her population as compared with other States; and I thought a fair recognition of this fact might diminish the number of her citizens to be drafted for the military service. And if the matter could have been fairly decided, on high and honorable grounds, that would have been the result. But instead of that, sir, the allowance of naval credits to the States, taken all together, has been a positive disadvantage to Maine. And for this simple reason: so many more have been allowed to other States than they were fairly entitled to that Maine relatively lost in the distribution. New York got some thirty thousand of these credits, and Massachusetts, I believe, some seventeen thousand, while Maine was assigned only some thirty-three hundred by the War Department. Other States, you will observe, were thus relieved to so much larger degree than Maine that the reaction was against us, and in the very next draft we found ourselves with a larger quota assigned to us than we should have had if no such thing as credits for naval enlistments had ever been allowed.

But, sir, aside from this injustice to my own State, a very great evil has sprung up in the matter of these naval credits. So far as they were assigned to the general credit of the State and went to the reduction of the entire quota the benefit was the same to all sections of the State, and was in this respect impartial. But on top of this, throughout the whole country we hear of substitute brokers selling these credits obtained in some mysterious way as one would sell town scrip in the market; and from this source has risen a large number of those constructive "paper credits" against which my amendment is leveled, and which, for the future, it will prevent. It may not be in our power to remedy the wrong practices of the past, but from this time forward we can guard against the repetition of these practices. We can deal with equal and exact justice to all men and to all sections—and above all, we can deal justly by the Government in its struggle for existence. In its hour of peril it calls for men; living, active, resolute men, and it is worse than madness to answer this call with anything else than men.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that nothing so discourages and disheartens the brave men at the front as the belief that proper measures are not adopted at home for reinforcing and sustaining them. Even a lukewarmness or a backwardness in that respect is enough; but when you add to that the suspicion that unfair devices have been resorted to by those charged with filling quotas, you naturally inflame the prejudices and passions of our veterans in the field in a manner calculated to lessen their personal zeal and generally to weaken the discipline of the Army. After four years of such patriotic and heroic effort for national unity as the world has never witnessed before we cannot now afford to have the great cause injured or its fair fame darkened by a single unworthy incident connected with it. The improper practices of individuals cannot disgrace or degrade the nation; but after these practices are brought to the attention of Congress we shall assuredly be disgraced and degraded if we fail to apply the requisite remedy when that remedy is in our power. Let us, then, in this hour of triumph to the national arms do our duty here, our duty to the troops in the field, our duty to our constituents at home, and our duty, above all, to our country, whose existence has been in such peril in the past, but whose future of greatness and glory seems now so assured and so radiant.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman to insert the word "county."

Mr. BLAINE. I will correct my amendment by inserting the word "county." I endeavored to get the nomenclature so as to reach the various local designations in the country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If I understand that amendment, it will have the effect to make the section retroactive.

Mr. BLAINE. No, it will not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The section provides that credits shall only be given to towns, wards, and other subdivisions for the men who actually reside in them. We provide in that section that it shall be operative hereafter. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be to require the whole enrollment for the impending draft to be revised and corrected.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. If any objection lies in that criticism it may be removed by inserting the word "future." I do not design anything like what the gentleman states. I desire only to correct this evil, and that the cities, towns, or wards which have sent sailors into the Navy shall have credit for them. My own State did not get credit for one fifth that Massachusetts did in the naval enlistments, when she sent two men for Massachusetts' one.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Maine whether under his proposed amendment the operation would not be, where a township on a former call had furnished more than its quota, to prevent that township having credit on the succeeding call for the surplus?

Mr. BLAINE. If they have furnished a surplus it gives them credit for it.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Vermont has furnished her own men.

Mr. BLAINE. I know she has, and I do not mean to intimate anything to the contrary.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I am unwilling to cut her off if she has furnished any more than her quota.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to cut her off, and my amendment will not cut her off.

Mr. A. MYERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he insert the word "future" before the word "call."

Mr. BLAINE. My object is to guard against fraudulent certificates which are put in, as has been the case in New York. I am perfectly willing to insert the word "future," as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that the section under consideration remedies that evil so far as all future calls are concerned. It provides that hereafter men shall be credited to the sub-districts where the men actually belong by residence. That will prevent the shifting of men from one locality to another, the taking of them from the country districts, seduced by the offer of large bounties, into wealthy districts, and crediting them where they do not belong by residence. The object of this section is that stated at the close of it, that fair and just credits may be given to every part of the country in proportion to the number of men actually furnished. The present plan has operated badly in some instances heretofore. Farming districts, and districts not able to offer large bounties, although liable to have all their men enrolled and subject to be drafted according to that enrollment, have found a large number of their men capable of bearing arms seduced away to other States and districts, thus working a very great hardship upon them.

Another effect of this section, and a very good one too, will be to make the system of bounties more uniform. One district not being able, by offering larger bounties than another district, to get men from other districts, the bounties will become more uniform, and all men will be credited where they ought to be credited—the place of their residence.

This act cannot be made retrospective, for the reason that it would require a complete going over of all the enrollments of the whole country. It would require a readjustment of the whole thing, which would take months and months to accomplish.

And besides that, heretofore the muster-rolls have not shown, in many instances, where the men did actually reside. They have simply shown where they have enlisted, not where the men resided; so that it would be impossible at the War Department to ascertain from the muster-rolls really where the soldiers resided who appear upon the rolls. This section makes it the duty of the Provost Marshal General to instruct the mustering officers and boards of enrollment to remedy that, so that the muster-rolls shall show where every soldier that enlists resides, and where he shall be credited. I do not see that the amendment of my friend from Maine does anything more than that. This section applies to the future, and I do not see that it improves the matter by putting in the word "future" in his amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I would suggest to my colleague that he would accomplish his object by repealing the eighth section of the act of July 4, 1864.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think it would entirely answer my purpose. I want to answer the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] very briefly, and also to raise a question of order. Is it competent for me to modify my amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I recall my assent to incorporate in my amendment the word "future." I want it to apply to this call. No injustice can thereby be done to any town in Vermont, because on this call the excess on previous calls will be credited to them. What I want to accomplish by striking out the word "future" is, that under the present call no factitious credit shall be allowed to apply to it; but that, where there is a bona fide credit, it shall lap over and apply to this call.

Mr. GANSON. I suggest that the gentleman use the words "present and future."

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I ask leave of absence for a few days.

No objection being made, leave of absence was granted.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last three lines. The amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. BLAINE] seeks to attain a very good end, but I think it will not accomplish his purpose. I do not understand that the present law allows any credits to any locality unless the men have been furnished in some manner, nominally or otherwise, and for that reason I fear the amendment of my colleague will be ineffectual.

It is singular that a naval State like Maine should complain of naval credits, but such is the fact. The law of last session, section eight, provided that the men then in the naval service, or who had served in that service since the commencement of the war, should be credited to the States furnishing them. But unfortunately in executing this law the States actually furnishing the men did not get credit for them. Early in the session I introduced an order directing the Secretary of War to state in what manner and in accordance with what rule the apportionment of naval credits was made. The reply was that the men in the Navy were credited to the States where they enlisted unless proof was made that they belonged elsewhere. This rule would be sufficiently hard on my State, because heretofore the Navy Department has usually had no enlistment station in my State, and consequently naval enlistments of men belonging in Maine have been made in Boston and New York. But I have reason to believe that even this rule has not been adhered to; and hence the result has come about which has been stated by my colleague, and Massachusetts and New York have absorbed almost all the naval credits of the country.

But worse than this, credits have been given to these States when no men have ever been furnished by anybody. Bold frauds; "paper men" have been substituted for sailors; and up to this time fifty per cent. more men have been credited to the different States than are in the Navy altogether. It is therefore time the thing should stop. By repealing this section no allowance would be made hereafter for any men put into the Navy prior to February, 1864, and that is what ought to be done. My State is quite willing to receive no credits for men not furnished, and she wants other States placed in the same category. She ought not to be obliged to put in her quota of live men—as good, to say the least, as any in the service—and New York and Massachusetts be permitted to fill up their quotas with "paper men." And for one, I am content to have the law repealed altogether, because I think that is the only effectual way to bring about a result which shall be fair all round. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that Friday next, after the morning hour, be devoted to business of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I object.

The hour of half past five p. m. having arrived,

The SPEAKER declared the House adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN THRUSH, of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

ILLUMINATION FOR UNION VICTORIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires permission to state that official communication has been made to the Vice President and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives that the public Departments of this city will be illuminated by order of the President this evening, and they have, correspondingly, issued an order to illuminate the national Capitol.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of merchants and residents of the city of New York, praying for the passage of the "bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of citizens of Decatur, Illinois, praying for the granting of a pension to Dr. Ira B. Curtis, of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of Norman Wiard, praying for the adoption of measures whereby the invention and fabrication of ordnance may be opened to public competition; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of Daniel J. Browne, appointed by the Commissioner of Patents an agent to visit various parts of Europe to investigate and report on the productions, manufactures, and commerce of Europe, praying for an investigation into the manner in which he has discharged his official duties, and that he may be compensated for detention and loss of time; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of Richard M. Williams, praying for the passage of an act providing that all those who have been drafted and paid the sum of $300 for the procurement of substitutes under the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and the act amendatory thereof approved February 24, 1864, shall be placed on the same footing with each other and with those who have furnished substitutes, and shall be exempted from liability to military service for the period of three years from the time of the payment of said sum of $300; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the tax on agricultural implements, and suggesting a tax of one per cent. on the gross sales of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of an extension of the time for the completion of the Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table, inasmuch as the Committee on Public Lands have already reported a bill on the subject.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 120) to authorize the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, to acquire certain right of way and land from the incompetent Wyandotte Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of S. D. Carpenter, praying for an examination of his invention of a new method of defensive armor in the construction of war vessels, with a view to its adoption by the Government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of contractors with the Navy Department for the building of certain vessels of war known as double-enders, and the memorial of William H. Webb, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 119) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes and others; which was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the construction of a military and wagon road from some point on the west side of the Missouri river, in Nebraska Territory, to Gallatin, in Idaho Territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the communication of David Gowdey, addressed to Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE, alleging certain inaccuracies in the census report of 1860 in regard to the number and location of reed-makers in the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a law making uniform regulations throughout the United States of the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, except as to the place of choosing Senators, defining the qualifications requisite for electors, and abrogating such regulations prescribed by the Legislatures in each State or otherwise as may be inconsistent therewith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Presbytery of Cincinnati and the petition of citizens of the United States, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution as will more fully recognize the obligations of the Christian religion, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the executive committee of the Board of Delegates of the American Israelites, protesting against an amendment of the Constitution of the United States more fully recognizing the obligations of the Christian religion as prayed for in the memorial of the Presbytery of Cincinnati, dated September 20, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 345) to prevent the Secretary of War and persons engaged in the military service of the United States from interfering with the freedom of religion, reported it adversely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 108) to provide for submitting to the several States an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in reference to the mode of representation in the several States, reported it adversely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 101) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to allow the imposition of a tax upon exports, reported it adversely, the committee deeming it injudicious and unadvisable at this time to propose that amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of W. E. Morgan, second lieutenant first District Columbia volunteers, praying that he may be allowed pay from the 31st of May, 1863, to the 11th day of September, 1863, during which time he alleges he was held waiting the settlement of his accounts as acting assistant quartermaster, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 441) to enlarge the canals and improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, for military and naval purposes; the bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; and the bill (H. R. No. 322) to construct a ship-canal for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes, have directed me to report these bills back, not adversely or favorably, but to report them back accompanied by a joint resolution for the purpose of making surveys.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) to authorize surveys to be made with a view to the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, and improve the navigation of the Illinois river; to improve the Upper rapids and Lower, or Des Moines, rapids of the Mississippi river; and to improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 765) concerning regimental and garrison courts-martial, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific," approved March 3, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) to authorize the President to make transfers of officers in the Army of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 434) more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 600) for the better organization of the subsistence department, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 465) to create the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Nichols, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 469) for the relief of William Nichols; which was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jane W. Nethaway, praying for an allowance of back pay and bounty claimed to be due her late husband, and the passage of an act allowing her a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of Jane W. Nethaway; which was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 89) in relation to proceedings in the courts of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 459) to provide for the consolidation of the Indian tribes and to establish civil government in the Indian Territory, reported it with amendments.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Preston Starritt, a messenger of the Senate, claiming pay which he asserts has been illegally withheld from him, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That Preston Starritt be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate the amount of his compensation as messenger of the Senate from the 23d of July, 1861, until the 17th of December, 1861, at which time his office is considered as vacated.

COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. COWAN. I am directed by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom the subject was referred, to report a bill (S. No. 468) to amend the acts of Congress respecting copyright, and I ask that it may be put on its passage. I think it is important. It will only require a moment, and will lead to no debate.

By unanimous consent the bill was read by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the provisions of the acts respecting copyrights shall extend to and include photographs and the negatives thereof which shall hereafter be made, which are to inure to the benefit of their authors in the same manner and to the same extent and upon the same conditions as to the authors of prints and engravings.

A printed copy of every book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph for which a copyright shall be secured, is to be transmitted, free of postage or other expense, by the author or proprietor, within one month of the date of publication, to the Library of Congress, at Washington, for the use of the Library, and the Librarian of Congress is required to give a receipt in writing for the same.

If any proprietor of a book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph which shall be secured, shall neglect to deliver the same pursuant to the requirements of this act, it is to be the duty of the Librarian of Congress to make demand thereof in writing at any time within twelve months after the publication thereof, and in default of the delivery thereof within one month after the demand shall have been made, the right of exclusive publication secured to such proprietor under the acts of Congress respecting a copyright is to be forfeited.

In the construction of this act the word "book" is to be construed to mean every volume and part of a volume, together with all maps, prints, or other engraving belonging thereto, and is to include a copy of any second or subsequent edition which shall be published with any additions, whether the first editions of such books have been published before or after the passage of this act; but it is not to be requisite to deliver to the Library any copy of a second or any subsequent edition of any book unless it shall contain additions, nor of any book which is not the subject of copyright.

Mr. SUMNER. So far as I have been able to understand that bill in listening to it I agree with it, and I am glad the committee has reported it; but I suggest to the Senator that, considering its importance and the subject to which it relates, it should be printed before the Senate act finally upon it. I beg to assure the Senator that I do not make this remark with any disposition to throw any impediment in the way of the passage of the bill, but simply because I think the Senate ought to understand it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will say to the gentleman, which may perhaps relieve his mind on this subject, that the Committee on the Library have had this bill before them and have examined and approved it. It provides for including photographs in the copyright laws; and all the rest of it is merely for carrying into effect what used to be the law formerly, that one copy of all these publications shall be sent to the Library.

Mr. SUMNER. Then there are some statements as to what is a book. There are legal definitions in it. As I listened to it, I thought upon the whole it would be better that we should have time to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the bill (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

NEW YORK JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 184.

Mr. SUMNER. What is that?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a bill to divide the southern district of New York.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask, will it take much time?

Mr. HARRIS. It may take a little time and there may be some opposition to it. I cannot say that there will be.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will understand that at one o'clock there is a special order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My colleague, a few moments since, introduced a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Indiana in relation to a matter of a great deal of interest to that State and the State of Michigan. The Committee on Public Lands has reported a bill on the subject which will not occupy a minute of the time of the Senate, and I will ask the indulgence of the Senator from New York to let that bill be passed. It is of great importance, else the enterprise may fail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana asks the consent of the Senator from New York to have the bill before the Senate laid aside for the consideration of another bill. It is entirely at the control of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HARRIS. If my bill will not lose its preference I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will lose its preference.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I cannot consent, if it loses its place; I must insist on my bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in the admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with various amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line eight, after the word "a" to strike out the following words:

Judge to hold a district court in the said district, who shall reside therein, and shall have all the powers and authority which are now or may hereafter be possessed by any district judge in the said State; and the district court hereby established shall have such original jurisdiction as is now or may hereafter be vested in any of the district courts of the United States in the said State.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

District judge for said district who shall reside therein, and who shall possess the same powers and perform the same duties within said district which are now possessed and performed by the district judge of the southern district of New York. The said judge shall also receive the same compensation as is by law provided for the judge of said southern district. District and circuit courts for the trial of causes shall be held in the city of Brooklyn on the first Wednesday of every month. The courts so to be held shall have the same jurisdiction as is now or may hereafter be vested in other district and circuit courts of the United States.

So that the section will read:

That the counties of Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond, in the State of New York, with the waters thereof, are hereby constituted a separate judicial district of the United States, to be styled the eastern district of New York. The President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a district judge for said district, who shall reside therein, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-eight, after the word "manner" to insert the words "and with the same fees and emoluments;" so that the clause will read:

Such officers shall be appointed for said district and court and in the same manner and with the same fees and emoluments as prescribed by law for other districts and courts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall in any way change or impair the jurisdiction or powers of the circuit court of the United States held in the southern district of New York, as now organized; but the said circuit court, so held, shall be deemed to be, and shall possess all the powers of, a circuit court held within the said eastern district; and appeals and writs of error from any decree or judgment of the district court of said eastern district shall lie to the circuit court to be held in the southern district of New York in the same manner and with like effect as if said circuit court were held within said eastern district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line nine, after the word "waters" to strike out the following words:

The salary of the judge of said courts shall be $5,000 per year, payable quarterly out of the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of section four to strike out the following words:

But he shall not, except when called upon by the associate judge of the Supreme Court designated to hold the second circuit, be authorized to act as circuit judge, nor to hold the circuit within said southern district.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case of the inability, on account of sickness, of the judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, to hold any court therein, it shall be the duty of the judge of the said eastern district of New York to hold such court, and do and perform all the acts and duties of the judge of said southern district, without any additional compensation; and whenever, from pressure of public business or other cause, it shall be deemed desirable by the judge of said southern district of New York that the judge of said eastern district perform the duties of a judge in said southern district, an order may be entered to that effect in the records of said district court, and thereupon the judge of said eastern district shall be empowered to do and perform, without additional compensation, within said southern district of New York, and in the district court thereof, all the acts and duties of the district judge thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all cases of prize brought in the district court for said eastern district shall have preference over all other causes upon any calendar of said court or pending thereon; and a term of said court for the trial of causes shall be held on the first Wednesday of each month, in the city of Brooklyn. Such other terms may be held at such other times and places within said district as may be fixed by the judge of said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me very inexpedient to pass a bill of this sort at this time. It proposes to create a new district in the southern district of New York, and to add, of course, a district judge, marshal, district attorney, and the other officers connected with a district court, thus to charge upon the Treasury of the United States, in the matter of expense, a sum of more than $50,000 a year. I am aware that that by itself is not a sufficient reason why the bill should not pass, if the public interest requires it; but I submit that the necessity should be apparent and great in order to justify such an increase of expense at this time.

The grounds on which it is asked are, as I understand, the great pressure of business in the southern district and circuit of New York; and it is true, no doubt, that in that great metropolis there is a large amount of business in the district court. But, Mr. President, I do not believe that the creation of a new district court will work the relief to the public that the friends of this bill anticipate. To create a new district court, giving to this new district court concurrent jurisdiction with one already established, and within, in effect, the same limits, is an anomaly in our jurisprudence and in our legislation. This district is not divided from any other district by limits as all other districts in the United States are. The northern district of New York is divided from the southern district by a known, well-defined line; and so in all the States where there is more than one district. The limits of each district are defined by law; and it seems to me, I confess, rather a necessity, to prevent confusion in the transaction of business, that it should be so. But this bill gives to this new district court, the creation of which is contemplated by the bill, concurrent jurisdiction with the existing district court, which is called the court for the southern district of New York, and this is to be called the eastern district—not separated from the southern by definite limits, but having concurrent jurisdiction with it. There will be, as it seems to me, great difficulty and great confusion inevitably growing out of such a condition of things.

The reason urged for the new district, as I have suggested, is the great pressure of business. Mr. President, this will not relieve that pressure. This proposes to have the court held in the city of Brooklyn, which, although a large and prosperous city, is really a portion of the city of New York; and this new district is but a portion of the southern district, the two courts having concurrent jurisdiction. The great reason of the delay of business in the district court in the city of New York, the southern district, is not so much the great number of cases in court, although that number is very great, but it arises from the fact, more than any other, that the counsel who are engaged in important causes in that district court are leading counsel in most of the other causes of importance which arise in the courts in the city of New York, as well State as Federal. The counsel thus engaged in the important causes in the southern district have engagements in the State and other Federal courts in session in the city at the same time; and when a cause comes up in the southern district for trial the counsel, or a part of them who are engaged in it, are engaged in trials in other courts in session in the city. That works more delay and inconvenience than any other single reason, if not more than all other reasons, to delay business and prevent the clearing of the docket. Members of the profession are courteous to each other, and when the counsel on the other side are engaged in another court, they do not press the cause to trial; and thus the cause is passed by, and so on until the cause can be reached when the counsel are not engaged elsewhere. The consequence is, that business accumulates on the docket from term to term, because the counsel whom the parties litigant have selected to try their causes are really not prepared to act, and cannot act at the time the case comes on for trial.

If this bill passes and this new court is created, that difficulty, instead of being remedied, will be aggravated. The court will be transferred to the city of Brooklyn; but the counsel who will be concerned in almost all the important causes which will come before that court for trial are distinguished members of the profession who reside in the city of New York; they will practice in this court at Brooklyn; and when a cause comes on there for trial, if these gentlemen are engaged in the courts in the city of New York, these causes will be postponed, and business in this new court will accumulate, and will not be dispatched any more promptly than at present. This bill will multiply courts and embarrass business rather than facilitate its dispatch.

Mr. President, the law now is that the circuit judge may call to his aid in the southern district of New York one or more judges of adjacent districts in the same circuit, who may hold this district court in the southern district of New York from year's end to year's end if the necessities of the public business require it. There is no limit to the time that these courts may sit, and two courts, or rather two judges, may be in session at once. There is no conceivable difficulty in dispatching the business which may accumulate in the court of the southern district of New York, at least so far forth as having judges sit to try and determine all causes arising in that district.

I repeat, Mr. President, that the occasion of the accumulation of business does not arise from the fact that there are not courts enough and judges enough, but mainly because the counsel that are engaged are also engaged in other courts, and cannot try their causes in two courts at once. That is the grand difficulty. Although the city of New York is blessed with a very large number of the members of the legal profession, like most other towns and cities in the United States, still the important legal business of that city, the great and important causes tried in that city, are tried by comparatively few men. Some half dozen men try most of the important causes that arise in the courts in the city of New York. I do not mean that they try all the causes, but that great and important questions involving large amounts of property are tried by comparatively very few of the profession.

Now, Mr. President, if you create a new court you aggravate the existing evil; the accumulation of business is chargeable to our having too many courts now. I honestly believe if there was but one court in that city more business could be accomplished than is accomplished by the whole now, for then all the counsel of the city would be in attendance upon that court; no cause would be put off because counsel were engaged in other courts. One single court, held by competent judges, would dispose of more business in a year than is disposed of by the whole now.

There are a great many persons that desire the passage of this bill; the honorable Senator from New York, of course, is better qualified to form an opinion as to the wants of his constituents than I am; but, with deference to his opinion, I must say that I believe the better judgment of the city of New York is against the creation of this court. I believe that the sense of the profession is against it. A very large number of the members of the bar of that city deprecate the passage of this bill. Many of them signed a remonstrance against the bill, which has been received here, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. I will not say that these remonstrants compose a majority of the members of the legal profession of the city of New York, but a very large number of the most prominent are on it. I am told that some of them have since changed their opinions; but I believe it is the settled judgment of the profession that the creation of this court will not be a public advantage, but will be a public misfortune. I trust that the bill will not pass.

Mr. HARRIS. I am so anxious to have action on this bill that I shall content myself with stating a very few facts very briefly.

In this southern district of New York there were commenced in the year 1863, as appears by a report made in answer to a resolution which was offered by the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in April last, two thousand one hundred and four causes. It appears that in the whole thirty-two judicial districts in the States that have not seceded there were seven thousand and four causes. From this it will appear that nearly one third of all the actions brought in the Federal courts in the year 1863 were brought in the southern district of New York. Much more than a quarter of all the business of the Federal courts is in the southern district of New York.

Now, sir, two sessions ago I introduced a bill providing for the appointment of an assistant judge in New York; but there were so many objections to it that it was thought best to drop that measure; and those who are most deeply interested in the performance of the judicial business in the city of New York have thought it best to provide for an additional district. Sir, the business cannot be done in the city. The same thing has been found true in respect to our State courts. Our State constitution provided for a supreme court in the city of New York, consisting of five judges. The State of New York has found it necessary, in order to provide for the business within the State jurisdiction, to create a superior court there of six judges, and also a court of common pleas, consisting of three judges; making one court of five judges, another of six, and another of three, all of concurrent jurisdiction; and it has been found to work well.

We contemplate by this bill simply to provide a district to be composed of the three counties of Long Island and the county of Richmond, Staten Island, with a population of about half a million and an amount of business far exceeding that of almost any other district in the United States. It is a little surprising that the Senator from Connecticut should feel it necessary to interpose in opposition to this bill, for the purpose (I will not say that this is his intention) of having the present state of things go on, and having judges from other districts brought in there to aid the judge in the southern district of New York. It is true that Connecticut furnishes a very able judge, who is enabled in consequence of the very small amount of business that he has to do at home to go in there and hold court for a large portion of the year. But, sir, it may not be improper for me to add that for the duties that he performs in the State of New York he receives much more compensation than he does for his salary as district judge of the State of Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. When the honorable Senator says that the judge from Connecticut who sits in court in New York receives more than he does for his salary in Connecticut, I think, with great deference to him, he is entirely mistaken. He does not, I believe, receive one cent. It is true his salary as district judge in Connecticut is very small, very much smaller than it ought to be; it is not remunerative; but it is something; and inasmuch as in New York he does not get one cent, I think the honorable Senator is mistaken. It is true that his expenses are paid; his board while there is paid; and I suppose his railroad fare to and fro. If that is what the honorable Senator calls receiving more than he gets for his salary, I think he is mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS. I hold in my hand a memorandum which I took from the records of the Treasury Department, showing that Judge Shipman received for the first six months of last year for his services for holding court in New York $1,759 45.

Mr. FOSTER. Then he receives it without law, because the law does not authorize him to receive one cent; and I did not suppose that the accounting officers, either at New York or here, paid judges when there was no law to pay them one farthing.

Mr. JOHNSON. I imagine the Senator from New York will find that the $1,700 is made up of the per diem which the judge receives, and is intended to pay expenses and nothing else, and is not intended as compensation, I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. It is no compensation, and there is no bill for compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I say I do not suppose it was intended for compensation.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not understand that it is compensation.

Mr. FOSTER. If it is not compensation there is nothing between us.

Mr. HARRIS. It has this effect, however; Judge Shipman can hold court in New York the year round, and according to this rate he can receive $3,500 for his expenses besides his salary of $2,000 as judge of Connecticut. But I make no complaint of that. Judge Shipman is an excellent judge, and has rendered valuable services there.

But, sir, it is necessary that there should be more judicial courts in New York. Any one can see that with nearly one third of the business of the United States done in that southern district there must be some relief, and it is thought by those most familiar with the circumstances that this is the best mode of relief. Two sessions ago the Senate was willing to pass a bill to create a new judicial district in the State of Michigan, neither of which districts has one quarter of the amount of business, and each of which a far less population, than the district now proposed. But, sir, I am so anxious to have a vote upon this bill that I will not detain the Senate further. I hope it may be put on its passage.

Mr. FOSTER. One word only. As it regards my interference on the ground that the district judge from Connecticut is called to New York, I can assure the Senator that, so far as that is concerned, it furnishes no reason to me to interfere, and could furnish none. In the first place, I believe it would be greatly for the advantage of the judge to be relieved from the labor, which, I again repeat, he performs without one cent of compensation. There is nothing, therefore, of interest which the judge can have unless it may be to labor and receive his board for his pay; for that is all he gets. I will read a portion of a letter of a highly distinguished member of the bar of New York, who writes under date of February 3, in regard to this bill, as follows:

"This bill creates what is called an eastern district of New York, and supplies it with an establishment of judge, clerk, district attorney, and marshal, incurring an expense of certainly $50,000 a year, beside rent and cost of courtroom and officers. I can imagine no public ground for such a measure, and mischiefs of the gravest character in the administration of justice are sure to follow from this division of the port of New York into two judicial districts, which is the effect of the bill. The whole supply of maritime, admiralty, or commercial business for the new court, as at present for the existing court will come from the port of New York; and we shall have the strange spectacle of two Federal judicial establishments holding courts within three miles of each other, sitting at the same time all the year round, and dragging the waters of New York bay into concurrent jurisdiction in competition for business. We suffer but one need in this district for the due dispatch of business, and that is an additional judge, involving no legislation but the creation of the office, no expense but his salary, and no disturbance of the administration of justice. The mere statement of the case has heretofore been sufficient to prevent this measure from finding acceptance with the members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, to whom I spoke upon the subject last year, and I supposed the project was abandoned, at least while the general subject of remodeling the whole judicial system was pending in Congress and before the public. This latter measure is, I think, sure to be adopted either by this Congress or the next, and I should suppose this consideration alone would prevent the creation of a new judicial establishment at present."

I will not take up further time, as I am surely not disposed to prevent a vote being taken on the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is the first bill for the division of a judicial district in the United States since I have been a member of the Senate that I have ever supported. I have uniformly opposed all bills for dividing the judicial districts of the United States, and thereby increasing the business in the United States courts. I have thought the effect was bad in the creation of numerous unnecessary officers, in adding to the expense of the Government, and in increasing business in a court which is already overburdened. The more of these courts you have, the more convenient it is for litigants to bring their suits in the United States courts, the more cases you will have; and we all know that the Supreme Court is already overburdened with business. These courts were not designed for the transaction of the general business of the country; and I think if no suits were brought in them other than such as were contemplated to have been tried in the United States courts by the framers of the Constitution, there would be altogether less business before the Supreme Court than there is.

But, sir, only a year or two ago, contrary to the views which I entertained, Congress divided the judicial district in Michigan, and created a new set of officers there. I have before me a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicated to this body on the 6th of December last, showing how much business there is in this western district of Michigan. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it. I opposed the creation of that district at the time; I thought there was no sort of necessity for it; and the official report now shows that all the cases pending in the western district of Michigan are twenty-six, and not one single case was commenced in that court during the last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT.) The Chair is obliged to request the Senator from Illinois to suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired, the pending bill before the Senate is superseded by the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate not more than five minutes, and I think we had better dispose of this bill now.

Mr. SUMNER. If there can be an understanding that the special order be passed over informally, by unanimous consent, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent the special order can be passed over informally. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, that would afford no reason for passing this bill, because we improperly passed a bill to divide the State of Michigan into two judicial districts. But the same paper that I have before me, I think, contains a reason for the passage of this bill. This official report shows that in the southern district of New York there were two thousand one hundred and four cases commenced during the last year. It is a fact notorious to the Senate and the country that the business in the city of New York, it being the great commercial port of the country, in the United States court, is much larger than in any other court in the country. The admiralty and maritime jurisdiction alone there requires the session of a court, I suppose, nearly the whole time. The fact is that the judges from other districts, from Vermont and from Connecticut, have been compelled to go to New York to hold the courts under a provision of law that authorized the justice of the Supreme Court presiding in that circuit to call in the assistance of district judges anywhere within his circuit in order to dispose of the business. There is an amount of business in the southern district of New York that cannot be done by the judge of that district; it is a physical impossibility. You have an amount of business in that district that cannot be done by the court you have there. In order to remedy the defect, other judges from other districts are called in from time to time to help. Here is a bill proposing to divide that district so as to afford additional facilities for the transaction of business that cannot be done in the one district court. Sir, if there is an occasion for an additional district court anywhere in the United States, it is in the southern district of New York; and therefore, for the first time since I have been a member of the Senate and a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which these bills have gone, I am found favoring the division of a judicial district; and I do it simply upon the ground that the amount of business there requires it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Hale, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Dixon, Foster, Grimes, Ten Eyck, and Wade—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Cowan, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Rumsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—17.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, its title was amended so as to read, "A bill to create the eastern judicial district of New York."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City and Territory of Nevada, for the purpose of a branch mint located in said place, and in the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 240) for the relief of George A. Schreiner;

A bill (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled, "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864; and

A bill (S. No. 241) to amend an act entitled, "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind," approved February 16, 1857.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 756) supplementary to the several acts regulating pensions;

A bill (H. R. No. 774) to establish certain post roads; and,

A bill (H. R. No. 776) concerning the Potomac bridge and Center market.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER. House bill No. 307 has been put aside now for about a week. I desire to get action on it to-day. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] is prepared to make a speech upon it, and has been for a week, and I hope the Senate will be courteous enough to a Senator young and inexperienced to grant him this morning to make his speech, and I appeal to Senators to put aside not only the freedmen's bill but all other measures, and let us take up this commercial bill, act upon it, and pass it to-day. I move, and I hope the Senate will sustain me in the motion, to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 307.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Michigan knows that I am for his bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let us have it.

Mr. SUMNER. I say "let us have it," but I ask the Senate to let us have the other bill first; let us have business according to its order. The Senate adjourned last night with the report of the conference committee under discussion; that is the unfinished business, and I hope the Senate will proceed with it to a final vote.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was not agreed to.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following report of the committee of conference on House bill No. 51:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An Act to establish a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, whose object shall be the good of the freedmen and the administration of lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States not heretofore appropriated to other uses. And this Department shall be under the care of a Commissioner, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with an annual salary of $4,000.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands shall appoint a chief clerk, with an annual salary of $3,000, who shall act also as disbursing officer, and who in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the principal office shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of Commissioner; and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. And the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $100,000 and the latter in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with sureties to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General, which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, create districts of freedmen and abandoned lands within the rebel States, not to exceed two in each State, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each district shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,500, under bond as required for the chief clerk, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, not, however, more than four in each district, each of whom shall have an annual compensation not exceeding $1,500.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners, under the direction of the Commissioner and within their respective districts, shall take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses, and all property found on and belonging to such estate, and shall rent or lease such real estate or any portion thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree; and if the lands with the property aforesaid shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon, and no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent: Provided, That no lease, permission to occupy, or contract, shall be for a longer period than one year, and all papers required or authorized by this act shall remain valid and effectual although no revenue stamp is attached thereto. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate or property above named issued in due course of law from any court of competent jurisdiction; but the possession of such real estate or property by any purchaser thereof at a judicial sale shall be postponed until the termination of any outstanding contract duly made and executed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall, as advisory guardians, aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or in the application of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; that they shall do what they can as arbitrators to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved with each other or with other persons; and, in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friend of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order, three hundred and thirty-one, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; but such lease shall not continue beyond the period of one year from its date; and immediately upon the organization of any district of freedmen and abandoned lands such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such district, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any district prior to its organization under this act, shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds accruing under this act to defray the expenses of this Department, so that the same may become at an early day self supporting; and any proceeds over and above such expenses shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall so far as practicable make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under this act without increase of salary.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings, with exhibits of the state of his accounts, to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required. And it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen not mustered into or regularly engaged in the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony; for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
J. M. HOWARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I understand that the bill reported from the committee of conference cannot be amended. I suppose I am right in that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The report must be adopted or rejected as an entirety.

Mr. HALE. As upon this occasion I shall have to separate in my vote from a great many friends with whom I have generally sympathized and have generally voted, I feel called upon to state to the Senate the reasons why I shall vote against this bill. It is with great regret that I feel obliged to oppose the bill.

Sir, in common with the other members of the Senate, I have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and as I construe that oath, I not only swore to support the Constitution, but all the amendments to it. The amendments are as much a part of the Constitution as the original body of the instrument. The fifth article of the Amendments provides that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

The twelfth section of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony, for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

I take it there will be no dispute that the crimes thus punished are infamous crimes, and such as the Constitution says no person shall be held to answer for unless upon a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia in actual service in time of war or public danger. Now, sir, it is pretended that these local superintendents and clerks and supervising special agents are in the land or naval forces of the United States, or in the militia in actual service in time of war or public danger? I apprehend there is no pretense that they are; and the authors of this bill have endeavored to obviate this difficulty by putting in a provision, not that they shall be in the land or naval forces of the United States, or in the militia in time of war or public danger, but that they "shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department." If it is competent for Congress by an act to declare that one man shall be so far deemed to be in the military service as to be liable to trial by court-martial, it is competent to declare the same of any other individual or any other class; and if it is competent for Congress to declare that certain persons shall be deemed to be in a service that they are confessedly not in, the provision of the Constitution is not worth anything; it is entirely nugatory, null and void, of no force or effect whatever. As it presents itself to my mind, this section of the bill is as clear and palpable a contradiction and violation of the Constitution as it is possible to have expressed in the form of language. That provision, if nothing else, would forever compel me to vote against a bill containing it. There are some other provisions of the bill to which I object; some of these objections I possibly might get over by some means or other if it were not for this, but this is insuperable.

There is another provision which I think very exceptionable. The fifth section provides that the assistant commissioners are to take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and to rent or lease it, or any portion of it, to freedmen, or permit the same to be occupied by them, on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioners and the freedmen may agree upon; and it provides further, "that if the lands, with the property aforesaid, shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons, on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon." If I am rightly informed, there are large sections of this country at this moment where there are loyal citizens of the United States and their families, that have been driven from their homes, houseless, hopeless wanderers, living upon the charity of friends, and I think as well entitled to the sympathy and protection and the support of this Federal Government and the friends of the Federal Government as any other class on earth. This bill prohibits any one of these individuals from occupying or having anything to do with any of these forfeited lands and supporting themselves in that way while a single freedman wants them. You in this way tie up your hands, and forbid your officers who are appointed under this law from making the slightest provision for any suffering white persons, loyal refugees that have been driven from their homes on account of their fidelity and attachment to this Government. You forbid these officers from giving them leases or any privilege in any of the abandoned lands so long as there is left in the country any colored person who wants them; and if at any time one of your officers under this bill may feel inclined to make some provision for some loyal, suffering white person, though he may have got the contract nearly consummated by which the outcast and the refugee is to obtain a place of shelter for himself, his wife, and his little ones, if a colored man comes up and says he wants it, your officer's hands are tied and he cannot move for the benefit of the white refugee.

I confess that I do not hold to that sort of philanthropy. I think I go as far as Christianity and humanity require me to go when, in cases of this kind, I let the white and the black stand together; but I am unwilling to have placed by my vote upon the statutes of this country a provision which would actually forbid our officers from extending any relief, even the slightest, to a white refugee, provided there was a colored person who wanted it. That, to my mind, is a very serious objection.

Then, Mr. President, there is another objection, which I shall state and then close, for I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate. I recollect reading the other day—I wish I had the article before me, but I have not; we get so many newspapers that I cannot keep the run of them; this was in a pretty orthodox, anti-slavery journal, which says "Down with the 'D.'"

Mr. SUMNER. The Commonwealth.

Mr. HALE. I believe it was the Commonwealth; pretty sound authority, for I think I saw an article in that same paper which counseled the anti-slavery Senators on this floor, who had any scruples on this subject, that they might be safe in following the counsel of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] And I will follow it just as far as I can; but when he asks me to neglect my own kin and kin to legislate for the exclusive protection and benefit of colored men he goes a little further than I am willing to go.

I will say further that from what little acquaintance I have had with the anti-slavery men and women of the country, (for the women have had as much to do with this movement as the men,) with those who have struggled and toiled for so many years, their action has been based upon the idea that but for the oppression which was practiced upon the colored people they would be competent to take care of themselves, and the argument was enforced by such suggestions as these: it was said "the slaves not only take care of themselves but take care of their masters; they do all the work, cultivate the plantations, take care of themselves and support their masters. Now let them alone; take off their legal disfranchisement and give them a chance to rise, and they will show that they are competent and able to take care of themselves." But, sir, by this system of legislation you virtually give the lie to the whole teaching of the anti-slavery men and women of this country so far as I have known anything of them for the last twenty years. You now say that the colored race are not competent to take care of themselves, that they want guardians and officers to protect them. But, sir, I would not venture to separate from my friends on that question if the bill were free from obnoxious provisions in other respects.

There is one other feature of the bill that is liable to great abuse, to which I wish to call attention. The ninth section provides that whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall as far as practicable make provision for them with humane and suitable persons at a just compensation for their services. In other words, these officers, if they see fit and cannot otherwise provide for the freedmen, may let them out on hire to their old masters from whom they have been liberated, or to anybody that they see proper; and in that way, whenever the Government comes to be administered by bad men, not so pure and disinterested and patriotic as we are; if we have to give place to other men entertaining less liberal notions than we do on this subject, what is to prevent those men under the operation of the ninth section from reducing the whole colored population back again to slavery?

Mr. CONNESS. The amendment of the Constitution will provide for that.

Mr. HALE. The amendment of the Constitution! I am glad to hear that, because gentlemen begin to understand the force of the Constitution. But what is an amendment to the Constitution worth if this bill passes? The Constitution says that these men shall not be subjected to military trial; you say "Very well, we will get around that by providing that they shall be deemed so far in the military service as to be liable to court-martial."

These are the reasons which will govern me in my vote against the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I shall be constrained to vote against concurring in the report of the committee of conference, and my reasons have been very fully stated by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] and the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE;] but I wish again to call the attention of the Senate to a bill which has already passed the House of Representatives upon the same subject, which I think in every respect far better than the report of the conference committee. The alternative is not between the report of the conference committee and nothing, but between the report of the conference committee and the bill which has already passed the House of Representatives, and is here upon your table. That bill was passed by the House of Representatives on Saturday last, after the report of the committee of conference was known and understood by the House of Representatives; and so unacceptable was that report of the committee of conference to the House of Representatives that after that action, by a deliberate vote, they passed that bill. Now, what are the distinguishing features between the two propositions? The bill which has passed the House simply proposes to give the Secretary of War, under the machinery of a bureau to be controlled by that Department, power to afford temporary aid and support to refugees of all classes, black and white. That is the proposition of the House of Representatives; the proposition of the committee of conference is to establish a permanent Department of freedmen, with a vast machinery, to take charge of the freedmen, not temporarily, but, so far as we know, for all time to come.

I am in favor of temporary relief and temporary support to poor colored persons and equally to the white refugees. But I have an old-fashioned way of thinking which induces me to believe that a white man is as good as a negro if he behaves himself. [Laughter.] Now, sir, the report of this committee of conference goes upon the supposition that the negro is wholly incompetent to take care of himself. The reason assigned for slavery by slave-masters for the last fifty years has been that these people are helpless, utterly unable to take care of themselves; that they have been under the guardianship of their masters so long that you cannot trust them with their own interests. As long as you keep them under the guardianship either of their masters, or of overseers to be appointed under this bill, so long will they be helpless and unable to take care of themselves. As long as you hold them up they will never stand alone; but the very moment you make them freemen and secure their rights in the courts of justice I believe they will be fully competent to take care of themselves. This proposition of the committee of conference only proposes a change of masters, under the provisions of the ninth section. You appoint commissioners who have a right to take possession of the farms, lease them to whomsoever they please, and then they may hire out these negroes at any price they shall agree upon between themselves and the lessees of the lands. That is what I understand to be the provisions of the bill, and under such provisions, it would introduce, in my opinion, a system of fraud and swindling unheard of in the history of the world. You give these poor creatures to the kind protection of broken-down politicians and adventurers, and decayed ministers of the gospel, and make them overseers to make fortunes out of these poor creatures, and they will treat the negroes, in my opinion, under this bill, far more cruelly than their masters under the old slave system did.

I am opposed to the whole theory of a Freedman's Bureau. I would make them free under the law; I would protect them in the courts of justice; if necessary, I would give them the right of suffrage, and let loyal slaves vote their rebel masters down and reconstruct the seceded States; but I wish to have no system of guardianship and pupillage and overseership over these negroes.

If this objection were not insuperable with me, the constitutional objection to placing under the Rules and Articles of War persons who have never belonged to the naval and military service would be sufficient; and if that reason did not stand in the way, there is another reason: this bill comes here in a questionable shape. The House of Representatives passed one bill upon the subject of freedmen, the Senate passed another; they differed in their provisions; and the committee of conference instead of, under parliamentary law, taking into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, over which alone they had any jurisdiction, come in and report a substitute essentially different from either the provisions of the House bill or the Senate bill. In my opinion they had no earthly power to do so. Is not the whole character of the bill changed? The bill as it passed the Senate provided simply for a Bureau of Freedmen; this provides for all the machinery of a great national Department of the Government, looking to no temporary duration or consequences, but a permanent system by which four million freed Africans are to be billeted upon the Treasury for all time to come. We make them free upon the theory that they deserve freedom, that they can take care of themselves. If I had believed these four million people were as helpless and as unable to take care of themselves as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to believe by his proposition, I should have cared little about their emancipation from one master to place them in the hands of another task-master under the forms of law.

The provision as it passed the House of Representatives is ample and sufficient to protect the rights of these Africans.

There is another omission in this report which would induce me to vote against it if every other objection were removed; and that is, that it makes no provision for white refugees; it makes no provision for the fifteen or twenty thousand Africans in the District of Columbia. This District, first born to freedom under the grand revolution made necessary by the progress of the rebellion, contains fifteen or twenty thousand suffering Africans here. This bill makes not the slightest allusion to them. There are more than half a million white refugees who have been driven from their homes in the South for no crime except that they loved their country, were true to their oath of allegiance, and remembered the grand historic traditions that cluster around the old flag. They are beggars, dependents, houseless and homeless wanderers, and your committee of conference makes no provision for them.

I cannot vote for this measure in any shape; and no man will doubt my anti-slavery record who knows me. I commenced more than twenty-eight years ago. The first speech I ever made in the Indiana Legislature was against the annexation of Texas and the extension of slavery. I have been true from that hour to this. I left Kentucky, my native home, the loveliest land that the sun ever shone upon, simply because I wished to live among a people who had free institutions. My grandfather and father before me were anti-slavery emancipationists in the State of Kentucky. Nor will any man at home either misunderstand or misrepresent my position; but whether they shall or not is matter of sovereign indifference to me. I stand here to discharge my convictions of duty according to my own conscience. If I stand alone, I shall vote against this most mischievous proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not understand the force of the argument presented by the honorable Senator who has just closed his remarks, when he objects to the report of the committee of conference because it proposes to take charge of slaves made free, and because in that it violates the position generally held heretofore by himself and his coadjutors on this subject, that the slaves were able to take care of themselves, while at the same time he proposes to support a proposition which not only proposes to take care of them, but to take care of white refugees also. It appears to me that if the negroes just discharged from a state of servitude are capable of taking care of themselves, there is scarcely a necessity for organizing a bureau or for charging a Department of this Government with taking charge and care of half a million white refugees. I do not know what the House proposition is, but I should hesitate to vote for any proposition that proposed to give organized subsistence to half a million whites, for I am very much inclined to believe that both white and black persons in this country who are in good health and of certain ages are abundantly able to take care of themselves. While that proposition may be true, it is also true, I apprehend, that in the sudden change from slavery to freedom there must be a great many black people who require assistance from us; and differing with the Senator last up, I will vote for the report of the committee of conference because it is the only proposition, I believe, that we can get, the best that we can get; but that failing, if the House bill comes here and is made acceptable to my mind, I will then vote for that. I confess that I do not understand the force of the reasoning.

Mr. GRIMES. The House proposition is here; I have it before me precisely as it was passed by the other House and as it now stands before the Senate; and, with the Senator's permission, I will send it to the Secretary to be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. It has been already read three times in this debate.

Mr. GRIMES. Not at all. I read it last night as it was first printed, not as it was passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator who spoke a moment ago read it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I did not read it. I referred to it.

Mr. CONNESS. There can be no objection to the rereading of the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read as a part of the remarks of the Senator from California.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. No. 698) to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a bureau be established in the War Department, to continue during the present rebellion, to which shall be committed the supervision, management, and control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the Department and approved by the President. The said bureau shall have one chief, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and such number of clerks as may be deemed necessary by the chief of the bureau, and approved by the Secretary of War, not exceeding two of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President may assign to such bureau, for the benefit of said refugees and freedmen, the temporary use of such abandoned lands and tenements in insurrectionary States, not belonging to loyal owners, as may be necessary, and may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws conflicting herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me that that proposition is obnoxious to the general argument presented by Senators who have spoken upon the question now pending in the Senate, namely, that it does propose to exercise governmental care, jurisdiction, and control over blacks, and over whites in addition. It appears to me that it is clearly obnoxious to the strongest argument which has been presented in this body against the report of the conference committee.

There is one other objection to the proposition just read that occurs to my mind; I will not discuss it, but barely state it. According to that proposition you commit both the blacks and the refugee whites to the care of the War Department. How long? Until the termination of the rebellion. When is the termination of the rebellion to be? When the President of the United States shall declare that by proclamation. We all expect that to occur now, happily, very soon; I trust that it will, but can Senators not see that if it should occur to-morrow, after this entire scheme is put into operation, it will fall with the proclamation of the President; and the control of the War Department over the blacks who have been taken charge of by the Department, and the white refugees to whom possessions have been assigned upon lands that have been abandoned by rebels, will cease; the whole scheme will fall the instant the proclamation of the President announces to the country that the rebellion is at an end. I am not willing by congressional action to put a great scheme in operation that may be terminated thus at any hour without caring what the consequences of that sudden termination may be. I suppose that nothing could be more disastrous to both the whites and the blacks that might thus be taken charge of by the Government than such a sudden termination of governmental control over them. But I am not prepared to say at this time that I could vote for the establishment of a system by any Department of this Government by which half a million whites or any other number of whites should be taken charge and control of by the Government of the United States; I do not believe that is necessary. Our Government, I think, has never failed to relieve the wants of loyal whites, refugees from the southern States; rations have been given to them under the orders of the War Department, as I understand, over and over again. I doubt very much whether, since this war began, a suffering white has been refused support by the Government, where those sufferings have been made known to the Government. But I do not intend to discuss the question; I am anxious for a vote. I really cannot see the advantage of the new proposition over the one before us, and it is doubtful whether I could vote for it from the slight consideration that my mind has been able to give it on having heard it read.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the measure that is under debate is not practical for the present year. At this very time in the cotton-growing regions, where they have had peace and the command of labor, the process of planting cotton is in full operation. Cotton is planted prior to the planting of corn in the cotton States, and it is planted usually in the latter days of February and in the first days of March, and in the course of the month of March both the cotton and the corn crops are planted in the southern States.

This is an important subject. There is great diversity of counsel among the members of the Senate and House of Representatives as to its best disposition. Why then hasten it by the adoption of a crude and imperfect measure that cannot be practically put into operation during this year? There is some sort of system now in operation in relation to the freedmen and abandoned lands in the South. That system necessarily has to continue for the present year. It is too late to inaugurate a totally new system and to give it a practical operation, because the time for plowing and planting cotton crops has already arrived, and it is the midst of the business of cotton planting. I think, therefore, that this measure ought to be dropped for the present, and that more mature and intelligent counsels should prevail for the purpose of disposing of this difficult and intricate subject.

But, Mr. President, I have serious and insuperable objections to the measure under consideration. We have all learned, in some form or other, the corrupting influence of cotton. There is not a man from the North who has gone to the South whose position and authority have enabled him to trade in cotton, that has not fallen under the temptations that were offered to him, and become a corrupt trader in that great staple. If the subject of cotton corruption among the civil and military employes of the United States Army could be thoroughly investigated and distinctly presented to the people of the United States, it would disclose a mass of venality and corruption that would shock what little of conscience is left to the nation in this hour of war. The measure under consideration is but a legal device for giving greater effect and efficacy to a system of corruption in relation to the management of cotton fields and the direction of the negro freedmen's labor necessary for carrying into effect the operation of cultivating the cotton fields.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] stated it truly that this is but a proposition to change one system of slavery for another; or in other words, upon the ruins of that system of slavery which you have overthrown, if indeed you have overthrown it, this proposition is nothing more nor less than to build up another system of slavery, temporary in its character, but which will hold to more rigorous and cruel service the freedman than he was subject to under the old system of slavery. Sir, what does it propose to do? It proposes that an independent Department for freedmen and for abandoned lands shall be established and become one of the great Departments of our Government. It authorizes the head of that Department to divide each rebel State into not exceeding two districts. It appoints a Commissioner with a salary of $4,000 to manage the Department, and it authorizes him to appoint in each district an assistant commissioner, two superintendents and clerks, and all the machinery of a great Government Department. It creates necessarily a considerable, I may say a vast, governmental machinery, which will be expensive, and which will draw for its support largely upon the Treasury of the United States. There is a delusive intimation in the proposition that it is to be made self-supporting; but any man who is acquainted with the South, with free negroes, and with the general subject of the bill, knows that for years and years at least this system never can be worked so as to become self-supporting. It must be billeted upon the Treasury for the payment of most of its expenses, and it will draw largely upon the Treasury for its support.

But the particular objection I have to it is, in the first place, that every assistant commissioner and every superintendent of freedmen and of abandoned lands in all the districts will be a secret partner of every man to whom he lets these lands upon lease and to whom he assigns any portion of the freedmen for their cultivation. That will be the inevitable result of the system. It will run into that abuse, and no guards or provisions which can be thrown around the system by legislation will ever prevent it from degenerating into that abuse. Here, then, will be from twenty-two to twenty-five assistant commissioners and from fifty to sixty local superintendents, with their retinue of clerks and other officers, who are by this bill required to be sustained by the military power of the United States. That will give them energy and give them strength by which all of their schemes and all of the policy which they will bring into this new freedmen's Department shall be rigorously executed at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. President, what will be the consequences? There are gentlemen in the Senate who have visited southern plantations. They know that the negro cabins are built in villages around the mansion. They are not scattered widely over the broad cotton fields. They are huddled together in the form of villages around the mansion of the owner, and the slaves who have been in the habit of laboring in the fields come there at night for rest and depart in the morning to their labor.

This measure proposes that lands to the quantity of fifty acres shall be let by the Commissioner and the assistant commissioners to the freedmen. Where will a freedman find a house in which to shelter himself and his family upon fifty acres of a vast cotton estate? There are no such houses except in these villages that are built up by the owner of the estate around his mansion. They are not distributed and located so as to be let in tenements of fifty acres. In addition to that, where will the freedman get the capital to buy his horse or his oxen and his plow and other agricultural implements to put his crop of cotton or corn in the ground? All these require capital—capital far beyond the ability of the freedman to command—and renders the scheme impracticable so far as it professes to be for the benefit of the freedman.

The inevitable result will be that the freedman will lease no land. He will not be able to lease and to cultivate land. He will not be able to purchase equipments of horses and agricultural implements that will be necessary for its cultivation. Then he must fall into general line and become simply a laborer, to be hired by the assistant commissioners or by the superintendents, and to be hired to some man with whom they are secretly in partnership, with whom they are to share the profits and the produce of the freedman's labor from these abandoned lands.

It is true the bill provides that only such lands as belong to disloyal persons shall be appropriated to that purpose; but these voracious men, interested in having a monopoly of the cultivation of cotton, being clothed with military power and with prima facie authority to gather together in their several districts all the freedmen, to hire them to whom they please, and at such wages as they may choose, will always take care to hire them to their secret partners. They will do that for the purpose of enriching themselves as well as these partners.

Well, sir, what then will take place? In the language of the honorable Senator from Indiana, it will be but changing the form of slavery. There will be the name of freedman attached to the negro, but he will be subject to be taken by the assistant commissioners and the superintendents to be hired out; and if there is any obstacle in the way of the performance of this duty they are to be backed by the military power of the United States. These assistant commissioners and superintendents are authorized by the law to invoke that power; and if there is any interference by the courts or by the military power in the neighborhood these officers are authorized by the bill to supervise the action of the courts, if there should be any courts, and even the military officers who are in command of the particular section of the country are liable to be overruled, to be controlled, to be directed in their notions of right, and justice, and policy, toward the freedmen by the assistant commissioners and superintendents, by these partners with every lessee to whom they will grant lands for cultivation. The consequence will be that a few favorites and secret partners of these Government officials, corrupted by cotton, will obtain leases of all the cotton lands in large bodies.

These assistant commissioners and superintendents are invested by the bill with power to hire out the freedmen to whom they will, and at whatever price they may agree upon. I have intimated that they will be partners in the culture of these cotton fields, and no human ingenuity or arrangement can prevent it. When their business will be to hire the freedmen to cultivate the cotton fields the profits of the culture of which they are to share, is it not inevitable that there will be vast abuse in the discharge of the duty of hiring the freedmen by these officials? They will gather them together, they will present this law to the freedmen, they will show that the law itself authorizes them to command the freedmen to assemble upon any plantation that they may designate, to go into the service of any lessee they may name, at any wages they may agree upon, and the freedman, awed and intimidated by the law, becomes submissive, and entirely obedient to the mandate of the commissioners and superintendents. He becomes as tractable, ay, more tractable and obedient than he ever was to his former master or overseer, because here is the power that has given to him the name of freedman sending its official agents into the region of country where he lives, exhibiting the law which authorizes those agents to assemble and to command the attendance and the rendezvous of the freedmen at any place they may designate, and provides that the freedmen shall labor according to their mandate at such prices as they may agree upon. The consequence will be inevitably that the negro will labor for the white man, will labor for the lessee in connection and as a secret partner of the superintendents and of the assistant commissioners. The whole scheme will become a system of corruption, of plunder, of fraud and oppression upon the freedmen to enrich the white adventurer who goes into the business of discharging the duties of commissioners and superintendents.

Sir, you need not tell me that men will not yield to such a temptation and fall beneath it. How many Army officers, how many civilians of high character have been corrupted utterly by the power of king cotton during this war, even at the risk of exposition and punishment by military tribunals? Here, when the whole operation is undertaken and put into execution by authority of law, with a machinery created by law, with power conferred upon the commissioners and superintendents, and that power to be sustained and to be made efficacious by authorizing them to invoke all the military power in the neighborhood to make their authority efficient, and to cause it to be respected, that the whole system shall become utterly oppressive and corrupt is inevitable.

Sir, I know something about the negro, and the free negro. My honorable friend from Indiana does also; and I tell the Senate that it is much better and safer for the free negro that he shall be left to his own instincts and to his own resources than that he shall be put under any such guardianship as is created by this bill. He will take infinitely better care of himself than these organized guardians by Congress will take care of him. He will protect much more successfully and efficiently his own interests and he will reap a much larger amount of the produce of his own labor if left to his own wits, his own instincts, and his own knowledge of men, than if put under any such guardianship as this.

Now, sir, I will say a word upon the twelfth section, which was read by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I cannot conceive how any Senator can vote for this bill in the face of that objection. I cannot conceive how any Senator can read the fifth amendment to the Constitution and vote for this bill. That amendment provides that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia in actual service in time of war or public danger. What is an infamous crime? I have here legal definitions of that phrase, but I will not read them. They all establish the position that the infamy of a crime depends not upon the punishment, but upon the character of the act that is made a crime; that wherever a man does an act that is made criminal by law and that act is of a base character, wherever it brings moral turpitude and degradation upon the man who commits the act, whatever that act may be, it is an infamous crime. The provision of the Constitution is that men who are charged with an infamous crime, unless they belong to the naval or military forces, shall not be held subject to trial and punishment by court-martial, but that they shall be tried only upon the presentment or indictment of a grand jury in civil courts and by the civil law.

This measure seeks to obviate the conclusive force of the fifth amendment of the Constitution by declaring that for purposes of punishment by courts-martial all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be held to be a part of the military or naval forces of the United States. Is it competent for Congress to pass such a law? The Constitution here does not speak of names, it speaks of things. It does not speak of denominations; it speaks of substances. The language used is more restricted than the term "service." It says in plain language that no man shall be subject to military trial unless he be in the land or naval forces, or in the militia in the actual service of the United States. What does the phrase "land or naval forces" mean? It means nothing more nor less than soldiers, men armed and equipped for war upon land or upon water; and because Congress chooses to declare that for the purposes of trial and punishment men who do not belong to the military or naval forces, men who are not soldiers, men who are not connected with the operations of war either upon land or upon sea shall be considered as a part of the forces for the purpose of trial simply, it does not make them so, it does not give them the character of forces, it does not attach them to the Army or Navy of the United States. They are no part of a body of men armed and equipped for war. They are still civilians. The term used in the Constitution and its significance is to be understood and used by Congress in the sense in which it was understood by those who introduced it into the Constitution. The meaning and the effect which the framers of this amendment to the Constitution and the Legislatures or conventions of the States that adopted it intended that the term "forces" should have, is to guide, control, and restrict the action of Congress. Congress cannot legitimately transcend the meaning and import of the term "forces" in the sense in which it was used by those who added this amendment as a part of the Constitution without a violation of that instrument.

Sir, as well might Congress undertake to declare to be a part of the military forces the gentlemen who wear shad-belly coats, and who call themselves friends of peace, and who preach peace upon earth and good will to men, and whose corner-stone, under George Fox and William Penn, was never to combat in war, but if they were stricken upon one cheek to turn the other. This vast body of men have become fierce advocates for war, have abandoned the principle upon which their sect was built up, and are now urging on the dogs of war with vehemence and energy. Could the Congress of the United States make an addition to this law, or introduce a passage in any other law, that these gentlemen, this body of men, having forgotten their principles and professions of peace, now stimulating the nation in bad passions to blood and to war, should constitute a part of the forces of the United States? It would be just as competent for Congress to pass a bill making them a part of the forces of the United States as to make the class of civilians named in this bill, though connected in employment with the Army of the United States, a part of its forces.

So you might take the strong-minded women of the North, they who seem to be the issue of the furies in their madness for blood and devastation and misery and war, and Congress might as well say that these modern furies should be considered a part of the military forces of the United States; and there would be quite as much logic, truth, and philosophy in declaring them to be a part of the forces of the United States as in declaring that these civilians, non-combatants, men who never bear arms, who are not soldiers, whose profession is not that of arms, who enter into no bloody fields, who shed no blood, shall be so considered.

Sir, there is no such absurdity and no such evanescence in the principles of the Constitution of the United States. The principles of this instrument are permanent; they are to be sought in the sense in which those who framed it understood its language. It is the duty of Congress and of the courts to look out and to study this language from the stand-point and circumstances in which they who framed and adopted the Constitution stood at that day, and to give to it precisely the same interpretation and sense which those framers intended it should have. When you adopt that rule of interpretation, the position that Congress by its legislation can make a non-combatant, a man bearing no arms, taking no part in battle or war, except simply to furnish the Army with some necessary supply, a part of the naval or military forces of the United States, is supremely absurd and untrue.

Sir, this great principle lies in the fifth amendment of the Constitution; it is a part of our Constitution, it is a part of the liberties of the people of the United States, that no civilian, no man who does not belong to the troops of the United States in the Army or the Navy, shall ever be held subject to be tried and punished by a court-martial. Our ancestry intended to establish that upon a rock as one of the corner-stones of our Government, one of its principles in its lowest foundation, that no civilian should ever be brought before a mere military court and tried by officers holding their commissions at the will of their superior, not by law but by the overthrow of all law and by the mere arbitrary will of that court or of the higher officer who supervises its judgment. Sir, the importance of that principle of constitutional liberty no man can appreciate. Next to the trial by jury—and it is a necessary adjunct and aid to that important principle—there is none of greater and more enduring importance to the people of the United States. This bill, delusive in its form, deceptive in its purpose, seeks to introduce civilians to the jurisdiction and judgments of courts-martial, drum-head courts. I say they have a right to be tried upon the indictment and presentment of a grand jury, upon a charge of crime, the crime already beforehand declared by law, and to have a speedy and public trial in a court of justice, the witnesses against them being confronted by them, they entitled to process to compel the attendance of witnesses in their behalf, and to have the benefit of counsel, and then to be tried by a jury of their peers. All these guards are bulwarks of liberty the bill proposes to throw down, to strike low into the dust, and in lieu of this charter of liberty guarantied by the Constitution to every citizen, to make him subject to a court-martial and to the arbitrary, illimitable, irrational, corrupt will, if you please, of that court, or of its supervising superior officer.

If such a proposition as that had been introduced into Congress under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan there would be no man more vehement and more earnest in his denunciation of it and its monstrous injustice and tyranny, and its utter incompatibility with this fundamental provision of the Constitution, than the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. That honorable Senator seems to have a strange hallucination. He is a man of ability, of learning, and of attainments; but when he has a favorite measure or proposition that he wishes to carry, I never met with a mind that yields more readily all obstacles, whether considerations of justice or of constitutional law, that stand in the way of his success. He marches over them, I think, with the fury and strength of a blind Samson; and whatever promises to him immediate triumph and success, although in its essence, in its nature, in its relations to the interests of society, to the liberties and welfare of the present and the future ages, it is of infinitely less importance than that which he would sacrifice to its success, to me it seems, although I may be deceived, that the honorable Senator is always willing and makes haste to make the sacrifice.

Sir, I cannot doubt that if the condition and relations of parties were changed, if the Democratic party was now in power and was wielding the vast forces of this Government, and was endeavoring to enforce upon the Republican party out of power the identical principles and measures which the latter has been so swift to impose upon the whole country, the Black Republican party would rise as one man, with one heart, and with indomitable energy, and oppose all this policy and these measures which they are now seeking to fasten upon the country, and which have overthrown the liberties and the Constitution of the country for the time. The only question with me is whether the overthrow is not permanent and final; but I hope not.

I trust, Mr. President, that this measure, which I think is so wrong in its policy, that will be so injurious in its effects to the freedmen, and that contains a vital stab at one of the most important principles of the Constitution, will now fail, and fail forever.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to say a word upon this measure, and I have taken it for granted that I should concur in the report of the committee, as I am very much in the habit of following the reports of the committees unless I have distinct impressions to the contrary.

A great deal of this debate, it seems to me, has sprung up on notions which certainly must be antecedent, I think, to this measure or to any consideration of this measure. I hear it said here that we should do nothing with the freedman; let him alone; take your feet from off his neck and he will take care of himself; give him a fair chance, a fair opportunity for life, and he can live. I sympathize very thoroughly with that idea myself; but I hear it here upon the floor of the Senate from a quarter from which I have been accustomed to hear very different sentiments. I hear it now from a quarter from which I have heard it said that he was not fit for freedom; that his only condition was that of servitude; that he must have a master and he must be a slave.

Now, sir, of one great fact we must take notice as legislators, and that is, that by the circumstances and the conditions of this war, by the action of the Administration, the executive and the legislative departments of the Government, the slaves of this country are or are soon to be free. Another great fact is that they are unprovided for. They come upon the surface of society unprotected, uncared for, unprovided for. Are they to exist in this unorganized, unprovided condition, or is the Government which is responsible for it, the Government which has freed them, to step in and take the direction and care of these freedmen?

Mr. President, I do not consider that is an open question. We are committed, according to my understanding of the case, to some provident care and supervision over this helpless, dependent class of persons. We have already upon the statute-book laws covering this whole case, and if you will turn to the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury you will find provision for these freedmen almost identical in its character and in its provisions with that contemplated by this bill. Let us see what is the law, what is the policy of the Government to-day in regard to these freedmen. First, we have declared by statute, and the Secretary of the Treasury has undertaken to carry it out by regulations prescribed by him with the approbation of the President of the United States, that it shall be the duty of the Government to appropriate the abandoned and confiscable lands in the rebel States chiefly for the purpose of employing the freedmen. We are therefore committed to that policy. We intend to appropriate the abandoned lands and the lands which under the laws of Congress are being confiscated, to the support and maintenance of this class of persons, and according to the rules and regulations of the Treasury means have been taken to produce that result.

In the next place you will see that by the rules and regulations made by the Treasury, agents are to be appointed precisely as in this bill, only under another name, "to take possession of abandoned lands, tenements," &c.; and then there is a provision for leasing the lands; then the terms and stipulations of the leases are given. All this is set forth in the document before me; so that I maintain it is the settled policy of the Government, by the laws of Congress, that these lands are to be appropriated to this end, the employment and support of this great class of persons thus thrown upon society.

What is the next proposition? It is what care and supervision shall we have over the persons of these freedmen? I hear it said here, "none at all; none whatever; allow them to find their own places." In the infinite disorder that now reigns in those States, the military disorder and anarchy that now reigns, and that is likely to reign until order is restored and the Federal authority is set up and becomes supreme in those States, there is no personal security and there is no personal protection for the rights of these men; and the question is whether we will allow them to be the prey of that disorder, or whether the Government of the United States will interpose its authority in their behalf, mediate between them and their former masters, and provide in some way that they shall have employment, that they shall have support, that they shall have protection.

The existing law of Congress contemplates that; and in accordance with that law I find that the Secretary of the Treasury has made rules and regulations, has already a department in the insurrectionary States providing for "the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within insurrectionary States, formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free." He goes on to specify what shall be done. In the first place there are agents to carry out these regulations. In the second place they are to establish freedmen's homes, colonies for the freedmen. Then there is to be a superintendent of freedmen, and his duties are specified. What are they? To give employment, food, shelter, and protection to the freedmen. Then there is a classification of freedmen and their wages; the wages of men, women, and children are classified, and it is his business to see that they are employed and paid these wages. The fifth article of these regulations is in regard to "employment to be provided for freedmen of proper age; applications for laborers to be received and recorded; written agreements to be made between employers and employes, and their conditions," and so on to the end of the regulations.

Now, Mr. President, I argue that two things are settled by the laws of Congress and by the regulations of the Treasury Department authorized under them and approved by the President, in conjunction with the rules and regulations from the Secretary of War. First, it is the law and the policy of the Administration of the Government that the lands which were abandoned and are confiscable shall be appropriated to the end of giving employment and support to the freedmen. In the second place, we are committed to the policy that it is the duty of the Government in some way to intervene with its authority, its protecting care over these persons.

So I submit that the large portion of the argument we have heard here on this subject is entirely outside of anything that is really proposed, because there is no proposition to repeal the laws or the regulations to which I have referred, and the only possible question to be addressed to the Congress of the United States to-day is, whether the provisions that have been made are ample, whether they are sufficient. We have intended by these rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War to accomplish all that the committee reporting this bill propose to accomplish. And since I have been here this morning I have been endeavoring to analyze this bill as reported from the committee; and in its objects, what it proposes, what it contemplates, and the methods to be pursued, it is almost identical. First, you will see that in the first section it declares that it shall be the duty of this Department to take possession of abandoned and confiscable lands; second, that it shall be their duty to take the direction of the freedmen, the care and supervision of the freedmen. Then you see in the object and in the purpose, and almost in method, they are identical. So to the end; and the only distinction which I can really see is this: as the law now stands the duty is to be performed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or under his direction and supervision aided by the Secretary of War, while by the measure proposed by the committee it is to be transferred to a distinct Department of the Government. One perhaps is a little more extended in its details, one perhaps is a little more permanent in its organization. I am not disposed to doubt that this bill having had the consideration of the committee, it is in its details somewhat more perfect and more elaborate than the one we already have. What I mean to say, and all I desire to say, upon the subject is that in the objects and purposes there is no difference between the law as it now stands and the law as it will be if the bill now proposed by this committee be passed. The only question which I see is whether really there is any necessity for this legislation. Upon that question, I have been, by the discussion and some examination of the subject, led somewhat to doubt; but as I said in opening my remarks, I had supposed as a matter of course that I should give my adhesion to this bill. I am not sure that in doing so I shall improve the matter.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I hesitate to add one word to this protracted debate, and in what I shall say I trust to be brief, and to speak directly to the point.

The Senator who has just taken his seat doubted whether the question could be considered at this moment as practical, whether, in short, there was a practical necessity for this measure. Sir, I have in my hand a letter which I have received this very morning from an officer, well known throughout the Northwest, of the Northwestern Freedmen's Aid Commission, dated at Chicago, February 18, 1865, and addressed to myself, as follows:

"I am distressed to see the Department bill hanging in the Senate. You can hardly overestimate our daily and hourly need of a new administration. Pardon me if I beg you to press it to a safe conclusion."

Now, sir, I believe that these earnest words are the voice of all throughout this country, from the Atlantic coast to the distant Northwest, who from the beginning of this war have interested themselves in the fortunes of the freedmen. Could their voice penetrate this Chamber they would say, with this writer, Press this bill to a conclusion. I wish I had the ability to do it. I wish I were able to impress upon the Senate the importance of this question, as it presents itself to my mind. But I say nothing further on that head; I pass at once to the objections which have been made.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] has reproduced to-day an objection which was made last evening, and which has been made more than once in this discussion. He objects to the twelfth section, providing that certain officers engaged in this service shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by court-martial or military commission. Why, sir, that clause came from the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] It was introduced into the original bill, on his motion, without a division of the Senate. At the time that he presented it there was but one general accord that, under the circumstances, it was a proper provision.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Massachusetts will recollect that at that time, while the question was pending in the Senate, it was believed, at all events by many persons in the Senate, and I among the number, that this bureau if established was to be a bureau of the War Department, and under the control of the War Department; and as it was necessarily mixed up with the affairs under the control of the military commanders of those districts, I felt that it was perfectly proper to secure against the frauds which might arise through the instrumentality of these special agents and commissioners, by providing that they be put under military control, and subject to trial by court-martial.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is mistaken. At the time he introduced his proposition the vote had been taken more than once by which the Senate had decided that this bureau should not be in the War Department, but should be in the Treasury. It was already the declared will of the Senate that the bureau, if constituted as a bureau, should be in the Treasury Department, and not in the War Department; and it was after those votes of the Senate that the Senator from Wisconsin introduced into the bill the proposition that has been assailed by the Senator from New Hampshire. The proposition cannot be changed in character even by the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is just as effective, just as regular, and just as constitutional if the bureau be in the Treasury Department as if in the War Department. There can be no difference between the two cases.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not take issue with the Senator in what he now says, that it would be just as constitutional if the bureau was in the Treasury Department as in the War Department, provided the scope of the bureau was to be confined to operations within the military districts where we have commanders actually in the field exercising their military powers.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill that is now before us is substantially the bill into which the Senator from Wisconsin introduced the provision in question. The bill has not been varied in any essential particular, except so far as it has established a Department by itself, instead of a bureau in another Department; and I say, therefore, that the proposition that has been assailed is now just as defensible as it was when originally introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin. Let me say that when introduced by that Senator I did not oppose it, for the simple reason that I was willing to do all in my power to surround these freedmen, for whose good I was laboring, with all possible protection, and to that end I was willing to go to the full extent of the precedents in the legislation of the country, even to the extent of bringing military power to bear swiftly against these officers, in the event of any crimes, or peculations, or frauds on their part. I say I was willing to bring the powers of the Government according to the precedents of our legislation to bear against them.

You do not forget an authoritative precedent. I have before me the statute of 1862, July 17, providing the punishment of contractors found guilty of fraud. In that statute it is provided (section nine) that—

"Any person who shall contract to furnish supplies of any kind or description for the Army or Navy shall be deemed and taken as a part of the land or naval forces of the United States for which he shall contract to furnish said supplies, and be subject to the rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces of the United States."

I take it when the Senator from Wisconsin introduced this provision into the original bill he had before him that precedent; he has followed its language, and if the provision which is now assailed is justly assailable, then is this earlier provision equally assailable. I submit, therefore, that the arguments which have been made against this provision must fall to the ground unless you are ready to declare that the earlier provision under which the Government is now acting is wrong.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator from Massachusetts remember that I opposed that section in the bill at the time on the very ground now taken?

Mr. SUMNER. I believe the Senator is right. I have no special recollection of it, but I know that he generally has opposed all that class of propositions.

Now, sir, what was the vote of the Senate when this question came up for a final vote? The Senator from Wisconsin had already introduced his proposition; it was in the bill; and the question was on the passage of the bill with that identical provision in it. I have before me the yeas and nays, which I shall read from the Journal of the Senate under date of June 29, 1864.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Connors, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson.
"Those who voted in the negative are—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, and Wiley."

That is the record. Now, when your committee of conference, following that record, have simply reported this measure back to the Senate, it is assailed as few measures ever before have been assailed, and all arguments, constitutional, political, personal, have been brought into debate. Is this just? Is it according to the usage of the Senate? I submit that the conference committee had no alternative. It was their duty to represent the Senate in its recorded votes, and there was that recorded vote of 21 yeas to 9 nays. In all simplicity, the conference committee have so acted. For one, I did not feel myself at liberty at that time to open a discussion which seemed to have been foreclosed by a vote of the Senate, and I acted accordingly. I believe that I followed the usages of this body, and also the dictates of sound sense.

But then, sir, comes another objection. It is to the fifth section, where it is provided that the Commissioner shall rent or lease such real estate or any portion thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree; and if the lands or other property aforesaid shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon. Senators rise here, and catching a tone from the worst days of the olden time, when slavery filled this Chamber with its voice, say that they wish to do something for whites as well as for blacks, and therefore, forsooth, they cannot vote for this proposition! And what is this proposition? It is simply to authorize the Commissioner to lease—nothing more—abandoned plantations for one year to freedmen, and if he cannot make terms with the freedmen, then he is to find such other persons as he can, and Senators here, with the old slavery cry, say that they wish to do something for the whites. I have already asked, on another occasion, whose sweat is it that has fertilized these lands? Whose rights lie at the very foundation of the war in which we are now engaged? Whose rights have for generations been assailed? It is fit that the freedmen should enjoy the first-fruits of returning justice, and they need them. They need precisely this very provision for protection against speculators from abroad, who otherwise would monopolize these very lands; and they need them also for the protection against their white neighbors, who have not yet recovered from the virus of slavery.

Some of you have heard of a patriot general who fell not far from here, on the way to Richmond last spring—I mean General James S. Wadsworth, of New York. Shortly before he entered into that last conflict where he lay down to sleep forever, he visited Louisiana, and there on the spot he made himself acquainted with the condition of the freedmen and their necessities; and now listen to what he wrote:

"There is one thing that must be taken into account, and that is, that there will exist a very strong disposition among the masters to control these people and keep them as a subordinate and subjected class. Undoubtedly they intend to do that. I think the tendency to establish a system of serfdom is the great danger to be guarded against. I talked with a planter in the La Fourche district, near Tibadouville; he said he was not in favor of secession; he avowed his hope and expectation that slavery would be restored there in some form. I said, 'If we went away and left these people now do you suppose you could reduce them again to slavery?' He laughed to scorn the idea that they could not. 'What,' said I, 'these men who have had arms in their hands?' 'Yes,' he said; 'we should take the arms away from them, of course.'"

Such was the testimony of this gallant general and patriot observer, who now from his tomb invokes the intervention of Congress for the protection of these freedmen. I might accumulate testimony without end in the same direction illustrating the necessity of some such provision. Here is Colonel Hanks, who expresses himself as follows:

"If civil government be established here and military rule withdrawn, there is the greatest danger that the negro would become subject to some form of serfdom."

Then again there is similar testimony—

Mr. CARLILE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at this point? I am not sure, but my impression is that this bill calculates that the superintendents of these freedmen are to be white persons. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SUMNER. There is no distinction of color. Nothing is said about it.

Mr. CARLILE. If that is contemplated by the bill, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator to what would probably be its effect. If these superintendents are white persons, and these freedmen are subject to the terms and provisions of the bill under these white persons, I think that what General Wadsworth fears is very likely to take place, and that there will be a system of serfdom.

Mr. SUMNER. General Wadsworth was not anticipating any serfdom from the friends of the colored race. It was from their ancient enemies, those who had claimed to hold them as property. Those were the persons against whom General Wadsworth warns us. He did not warn us against the friends of the colored race.

I was saying, when the Senator did me the honor to interrupt me, that I might accumulate illustrations in this sense without end; but I will content myself with one other. Colonel McKaye, of New York, one of the most intelligent friends of the colored race, while he was in the Southwest, had a conversation with Judge Humphreys of Alabama, which he has recorded as follows:

"Judge Humphreys says, 'I believe, in case of a return to the Union, we would receive political cooperation, so as to secure the management of that labor by those who were slaves. There is really no difference, in my opinion, whether we hold them as absolute slaves or obtain their labor by some other method. Of course we prefer the old method. But that question is not now before us.'"

I have read these opinions merely to bring home to the Senate on authoritative grounds the importance of providing some protection for this large body of freedmen, who may now justly look to the national Government as their guardian. It is that Government which has given to them the great boon of freedom. It is for us to go further, and see that freedom is something more than a barren letter. We must see that it is a living word, of which they can avail themselves always, and which will be to them everywhere fruitful of good.

Mr. President, I did not intend to enter into this discussion this morning. I hoped that a vote might be taken without further debate. I have no desire to debate it. To my mind the question is perfectly clear. If you reject the pending measure you voluntarily refuse to carry forward that great act of emancipation which you have already sanctioned. I say, therefore, for the sake of emancipation, let the report of this committee be adopted; and I appeal to you, Senators, do not be afraid to be just.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know, Mr. President, that I am afraid to be just. However it may be with myself, I am satisfied there is no member of the Senate who is not as willing to be just as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my friend will give way for one moment. I desire simply to give notice that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the fortification bill. I wish to give the notice now so as not to interfere with the measures of other Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am a little surprised, Mr. President, that the Senator, who tries to be courteous, and I suppose that he is courteous for the most part, should attempt to influence the Senate by appealing to their supposed apprehensions of the effect of their votes. That Senator has been long enough in this Chamber, I should think, to believe that there is not a member who is not as decided in his opinions and as willing to take the responsibility for acting upon them as he is, or any member of the Senate who ever came from Massachusetts.

The question before the Senate is whether this particular project shall receive its sanction. I understand—and the Chair will set me right if I am wrong in that particular—that the Senate have no control over the report of the committee by way of amendment. It must be, therefore, taken in the whole, or rejected in the whole; and if there be any provision in the report which is inconsistent in the opinion of any member of the Senate with the oath which he has taken to preserve the Constitution it is his duty to vote against the report.

Before I proceed very briefly to state why I suppose it contains such a provision, I beg leave to state to the honorable member from Massachusetts that there is no present need for this particular enactment. There is now upon the desk of the Senate a bill, passed almost with unanimity by the House, making provision sufficient to answer the exigencies of the moment, and providing not only for the freedmen, as the honorable member calls them, but for those who were born free, the white as well as the black. It is entitled, "An act to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," and it reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a bureau be established in the War Department, to continue during the present rebellion, to which shall be committed the supervision, management, and control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the Department and approved by the President. The said bureau shall have one chief, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and such number of clerks as may be deemed necessary by the chief of the bureau, and approved by the Secretary of War, not exceeding two of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President may assign to such bureau, for the benefit of said refugees and freedmen, the temporary use of such abandoned lands and tenements in insurrectionary States, not belonging to loyal owners, as may be necessary, and may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws conflicting herewith are hereby repealed.

If the President performs his duty under that act, provided it should become a law, (and no one has a right to doubt that he will perform his duty,) there can be no suffering among the black refugees or the white refugees. And although it is true that the black refugees outnumber the white, yet it is equally true that the white refugees number a very great many, and are in a state of almost hopeless destitution. The bill now before us makes no provision for them. Pass this bill, and they may starve. Should they be permitted to starve? What have they not done? Surrounded by all the influences that have carried away some of the best men in the country, they have sturdily resisted them, and at the hazard of life and all that they held before the rebellion took place. They are here now in our midst in a state of utter destitution, and the honorable member from Massachusetts is so wedded (and I do not blame him for it) to the black race that he loses sight for the moment of what is due to the white race. As far, therefore, as the necessity for legislation is concerned, the passage of the bill which has come from the House will answer all the purposes of the moment, and answer them more effectually, because more generally.

I rose principally for the purpose of saying that in my opinion the twelfth section of the bill proposed by the committee of conference is clearly unconstitutional. So vigilant were our fathers that they were unwilling to leave the right of trial by jury, as secured by the common law of England, to stand upon any provisions to be found in the original Constitution, and they therefore, by the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution proposed and adopted shortly after the Constitution itself was ratified, provided that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

There are then two cases in which a man may be tried for a capital offense without an antecedent presentment by a grand jury. They are cases arising in the land and naval forces, either in time of war or in time of peace, or cases arising in the militia force of the United States when called into actual service of the United States during war, or during the existence of public danger. The words, therefore, clearly exclude the right to punish in any other way than by previous indictment any man for any one of those offenses. Now, what do the committee propose? They were aware of that provision in the Constitution, and they seem to think that they avoid the protection which it is intended to give by providing—

That all assistant quartermasters, local superintendents—

Black or white, if blacks are to be superintendents—and clerks, as well as supervising agents, shall be—

Not in the military service of the United States. They are not to be considered as a part of the land or naval forces of the United States; they are not to be considered as constituting a part of the militia of the United States during the rebellion, but shall be—so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions.

Why, Mr. President, if we can do that, what is to prevent Congress from providing that every member of the next Congress and every officer holding any civil trust under the Government of the United States, executive, legislative, or judicial, "shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions," and deprived of the protection which the provision of the Constitution to which I have adverted was intended to cast around every citizen? It is obvious to my mind that if it can be done in the case in which it is proposed to do it, it can be done in every case. Why the Army and the Navy are to be excluded from the privileges of the protection secured by the amendment to the Constitution is obvious; why the militia when in the actual service of the United States during a time of war are not entitled to the protection is equally obvious; but it is just as obvious by the existence of the exception of these cases that in every case not falling within the exception the protection which the people when they adopted that clause designed to secure applies.

What would the honorable Senator from Massachusetts say if we were to pass a law saying that the honorable member from Massachusetts, the friend of the freedmen, is to be considered, as far as relates to the right of trying him for a capital offense or a misdemeanor, as in the military service of the United States? He would at once say that such a provision as that would be wholly unconstitutional; and what difference does it make who is the party who is taken out of the constitutional provision by a law which says that he is to be deemed, for the purpose of the mode of trial, to be without the constitutional provision? If you can do it in this instance you can do it in all cases, and the amendment of the Constitution is a dead letter whenever Congress thinks proper by legislation to declare it a dead letter.

Willing as I am to provide for this poor class, I am not willing to make a provision for them which strikes at a constitutional inhibition of that description; and even if I could yield my convictions of constitutional duty to considerations of policy, I should not be able to yield it in this instance, because as far as there is any policy in the matter it may be provided for effectually by the bill which is now upon your table, and only awaiting the sanction of this body to become a law.

Mr. HARLAN. I was in favor of the Senate bill on this subject that was referred to the committee of conference, and am in favor of some legislation. The question has been suggested in the Senate from different quarters, whether Senators were not compelled to vote for the report of the committee, or have no new legislation on this subject. I do not think that we have arrived at that stage in the consideration of this bill which will justify such a conclusion. It has been no uncommon thing heretofore to reject a report of a committee of conference, insist on the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a new committee. There are certainly some defects in this bill that could very easily be remedied by that committee if they were reconvened. If we had approached within a few hours or a few days of the termination of the session of Congress, it would influence my judgment very materially on this practical question; but we yet have a number of legislative days. There is ample time to resubmit the amendments of the Senate and this whole question to a committee of conference; or, if this were deemed inadvisable the Senate might proceed now and act, as the House has acted, de novo; or the Senate might take up the House bill which is now on the desks of Senators and so amend that bill as to incorporate all the valuable provisions in this new bill reported by the committee of conference, and reject the provisions which are evidently defective. Believing, therefore, that the whole subject is still under the control of the Senate, and that there is ample time to mature a bill for which a majority of the Senate can vote without hesitation, I shall vote against the report of the committee of conference with a view of insisting on the Senate amendment to the House bill and asking for a new committee of conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDRICKS (when his name was called) said: I desire to state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] has been called away from the Senate, and I agreed to pair off with him, he being in favor of the proposition and I against it.

Mr. NYE (when his name was called) said: I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY] who was obliged to leave, he being opposed to this report and I in favor of it.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Foot, Howard, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Harding, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, Nye, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wilkinson—12.

So the report of the conference committee was non-concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for another committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In what manner shall the committee of conference be appointed?

Mr. FOOT. By the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be taken as the sense of the Senate, if there be no objection, and the Chair will appoint Mr. WILSON, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. WILLEY, the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were signed by the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City and State of Nevada for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place;

A bill (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 240) for the relief of George A. Schreiner;

A bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864; and

A bill (S. No. 241) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind," approved February 16, 1857.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 756) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 774) to establish certain post roads—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (H. R. No. 776) concerning the Potomac bridge and Center market—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLMENT IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. SPRAGUE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all instructions and orders issued relating to the enrollment of citizens of Louisiana.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done, and before the vote is taken I desire to say to the Senate that it is necessary that we should take some action in regard to the State of Louisiana. There are two gentlemen here claiming seats from that State, and it is a privileged question before the Senate that ought to be determined. The Committee on the Judiciary have made a report on the subject which has been printed, and there is a joint resolution accompanying it. I think it due to the gentlemen who are claiming seats here and due to us that that question should be settled. If it be not a question of privilege, I shall insist upon a division of the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Michigan. I do not know but it will come up as a question of privilege at any rate. The resolution reported by the committee does not go to the immediate admission of the Senators, although it is a report made on their credentials. The resolution which the committee reports is that the existing State organization in Louisiana be recognized as the legitimate State organization of Louisiana. When that is done, the Senators as a matter of course would be entitled to their seats. If it is a privileged question, I insist upon it; and if not, I shall ask for a division of the Senate upon the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COLLAMER. Permit me to ask the gentleman whether that resolution is a joint one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, for both Houses.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall not undertake to advance any opinion as to whether this is a privileged question or not. I rise merely to say that the report to which the honorable Senator from Illinois has alluded was placed upon our tables in print only yesterday, and I have not yet had time to read the report. It is a question of great magnitude and great interest to the country, and I hope that we shall not be precipitated into a consideration of it unnecessarily. I want a little more time to examine the facts of the case. I am not yet prepared. My mind is not made up what course to take in reference to it, for the very reason that I am not in possession of the facts which I deem necessary to a full understanding of the question before the Senate. I hope, therefore, that this matter will not be taken up now, whether it be privileged or otherwise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to say, in reply to the statement of the Senator from Michigan that he is not yet prepared to go on with this question as to the recognition of the State government in Louisiana, that others are prepared to go on with it. We can commence the consideration of it, and perhaps he will get such information as he desires from others who are prepared to discuss it. I understand there are Senators prepared to express their views upon the subject now. I trust we may commence its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing all prior orders.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand it, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion now pending. In the opinion of the Chair, the other subject to which the Senator alludes is not a question of privilege.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill which the Senator from Michigan proposes to take up has already been discussed several days in this body. Now I understand the Senator from Illinois proposes to take up another measure which has never yet been approached in this body, and to thrust it in the pathway of debate. Sir, I do not think it good economy of the time of the Senate for us to proceed in that fashion. The Senator from Michigan is right in pressing to a vote a measure which has already been commenced, on which speeches have been already made, and on which the Senate has not yet reached its final conclusion. I think, therefore, the Senate should adopt the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, and let the other matter be postponed until we have reached a conclusion on the first question.

Mr. HALE. I think if there is a single question that ought to demand the attention of the Senate, and demand it immediately and until it is finally closed, it is the question that is referred to by the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I think if there is a question that looks to the perpetuity and existence of the Government, the reconstruction of the Union, and the salvation of the country, it is the question that relates to the reorganization and reconstruction of civil governments for these States, preparatory to their admission into the Union. It is the principal point upon which the whole controversy and gist of this rebellion depends; and I want to know how we can justify ourselves to the country by postponing that vital question, in these last days of the session, to enter into the consideration of a question which, whatever may be its bearing upon the commerce or the politics of the country, derives its principal interest from being a contest between two stock companies of the State of New Jersey. I trust that the Senate will not postpone the question of the reconstruction of the Union and the admission of these States for any such question.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am compelled, and I am pained to be compelled, to differ with the President on the question of the rule. When persons accredited to the Senate present their commissions, it seems to me, if there be any question of privilege, that must be a question of privilege. They have a right to be heard, and they have the right to have the question adjudicated, if they come here and claim a right to represent a State of the Union. I think we cannot well dispose of this matter without taking it up and considering it as a question of privilege. In my opinion, when the people of a State come here and claim to be heard, or to have a place on the Senate floor, it must be one of the first questions of privilege. It cannot be otherwise. We may differ as to whether they have a right to a seat on this floor, we may differ as to whether they have been qualified properly by their constituency, yet that they have the right and the privilege to be heard, to see whether they shall debate with us and vote with us with regard to great questions of government, is almost as certain as the demonstration of the forty-seventh problem in Euclid.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that this motion will prevail, and that this bill will be taken up. As the Senator from Massachusetts has remarked, it has been discussed for several days, an opportunity has been given to every man to express his views, and I think we are about ready for a vote. This is not a question of two corporations; it is one corporation versus the people and the business interest of the United States; and I am sorry to say that that corporation are able to pay for counsel.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to state that I shall vote for this motion, among other reasons, as a matter due in courtesy to the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] who took the floor, on the bill now proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Michigan, something more than a week ago, and it was made a special order for the next morning at one o'clock. He is prepared and desirous of submitting the remarks he has to make upon that question. It was overridden then, and has been to this time. I think it is a courtesy that we do not often refuse to a member under the circumstances.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 10; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. NYE addressed the Senate for some time without finishing. That his whole argument may appear together the portion delivered this day is reserved until it can be published with the concluding part. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the Senator from Nevada consents to give way to a motion for a recess. I will therefore move that the Senate now take a recess until seven o'clock. I will first inquire of the Chair whether we have a standing order for a recess.

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the Senator that we are to have an illumination to-night.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will withdraw that motion, I should like to have an executive session for a few moments to refer some messages.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no objection to that. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JAMES MITCHELL.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

REPRIMAND OF A. P. FIELD.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody A. P. Field as directed by the resolution of the House of yesterday.

The said A. P. Field having been arraigned. The SPEAKER said: Mr. Field, the duty has been devolved upon me, by the Representatives of the American people, to express to you their condemnation of the act for which you have been tried before a committee of their members, and ordered to be reprimanded at the bar of the House by their Presiding Officer.

In this Hall assemble those who have been chosen by the suffrage of their constituents, throughout the continental area of the Republic, to deliberate and decide upon the gravest matters of national concern. Differing often widely from each other, their acts and votes on many questions may prove distasteful to large portions of the people for whom they legislate; and the Constitution has therefore wisely declared that no Representative shall be questioned elsewhere for words spoken here in debate. Accountable as every Representative is to this body with which he is associated, to which is reserved the right of expulsion for whatever renders him unworthy of its membership, the House has repeatedly decided that menace, or assault by one member upon another, is a flagrant breach of privilege, rendering the offender amenable to whatever proper punishment it may see fit to inflict. And, while thus subjecting a sworn associate to its discipline, it claims and exercises the right to fix the penalty against those, not of the body itself, who endeavor, by threat or attack, to interfere with the freest action of its members.

In your case the offense seems more inexcusable, because you were yourself a claimant of a seat on this floor, and the question involved in the decision of that claim was one of far more than ordinary importance to the nation and your State. The Representative, who was first denounced and then attacked by you, was not a member of the committee before which the issue was pending, and whose report was necessary to bring it before the House. He had himself joined in the unanimous vote by which you were authorized to occupy a seat upon this floor, pending its decision, and to vindicate your claim to membership when the question should come before this body for its action. Yet, without provocation, without any preliminary personal controversy, you first insulted him at a public table and then followed it with a violent attack, with an open knife, inflicting a painful wound upon his person, and with threats that you would shoot him before you went to bed. You must rejoice that your assault did not terminate in graver results than those for which you are now arraigned.

It is but just to you to state that the testimony of your friends before the committee declares you to be "a gentleman of correct deportment, kind and amiable in your intercourse with others, and unexceptionable in demeanor, except on occasions of indulgence in conviviality;" and the unpleasant position you occupy to-day is, therefore, only another illustration of the exceeding value of that warning voice of inspiration, "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup; for at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

Invoking you, finally, to remember that whether as an individual or a legislator, "he that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city," it only remains for me to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to discharge you from his custody.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which bill of the House No. 756, supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to refer; and being put, the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the first section of the bill. I do it with the concurrence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] who reported the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. ROYCE.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, joint resolution of the Senate (No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting an estimate to supply a deficiency of $5,000 for the Chippewas of Pembina and Red Lake, under the treaty of October 2, 1863; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that Friday next, after the morning hour, be assigned for the business of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I shall object if the committee intend to report a resolution for the relief of naval contractors.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the Speaker whether the effect of such an assignment would be to override prior orders?

The SPEAKER. It would override them.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I object. I should have no objection to its being made a special order after the prior orders are disposed of.

CARSON CITY, NEVADA.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I ask unanimous consent to take up from the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. No. 45) in regard to the title of lands in Carson City, in the Territory of Nevada. It has been returned from the Senate with a merely verbal amendment to strike out the word "Territory" wherever it occurs, and insert the word "State." I move that the amendment be concurred in.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up, and the amendment was concurred in.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask unanimous consent to make adverse reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon the petition of G. W. Bonner, and the petition of Mary M. Lee, widow of Stephen Lee, for a pension. I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that Mary M. Lee have leave to withdraw her papers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to make an adverse report from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions upon the petition of the heirs of Philip Johnson, and the petition in the case of Mary A. Beraut, administratrix. I move that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE A. SCHREINER.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Senate bill No. 240, for the relief of George A. Schreiner, with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. STARR. I ask that the Senate bill (No. 454) be taken from the Speaker's table, being an act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February 21, 1863.

The bill was taken up.

Mr. STARR. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

PORTRAIT OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress to purchase, at a cost not to exceed $1,200, the full-length portrait of Lieutenant General U. S. Grant now on exhibition in the rotunda of the Capitol.

Mr. PRUYN objected.

DELAY IN PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I desire to make a verbal report from the Committee on Printing upon the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr.

WASHBURN,] in relation to the delay in printing the proceedings of Congress in the Daily Globe. We called upon the proprietors of the Globe, and they assured us that they have employed all the help they can obtain in this city, in Philadelphia, and in New York, and they are now negotiating for all the help they can procure, and they hope to be up with their printing in a few days.

In relation to the printing at the Public Printing Office, the Superintendent of Public Printing assures us that he is doing the work with all the rapidity the means at his command will enable him to do it. He hopes to deliver the Agricultural Reports during the week as fast as members may desire them. Further than that the committee do not propose any action.

I would state that I had here upon my table the reply of the proprietors of the Globe, which I proposed to have read; but some one has seen fit to remove it. I have, however, stated the substance of their letter.

SAN JOSÉ, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Lands a bill for the relief of the occupants of lands in the ex-mission of San José, in the State of California.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. HIGBY. A few words of explanation as to the character of this bill are due to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. What action is sought?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] desires to have the bill passed. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. It seems to me to be a bill of too much importance to be put through now.

Mr. HIGBY. I can explain it, I think, satisfactorily, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know whether the bill has been committed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. HIGBY. It has been, and he favors its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I certainly am not prepared to vote on the bill till I have a clearer understanding of it. It contains very important provisions.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts objects, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] making an explanation, provided I can reserve my right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's right to object will be reserved.

Mr. HIGBY. The lands here in question are some twenty-five or thirty thousand acres of valley land and hill and mountain land, to which it has been supposed there was a valid Mexican title. Three commissioners authorized by Congress went to the State of California to settle these Mexican claims—a class of claims in respect to which the Government of the United States, by the treaty made when California was acquired, guaranteed to respect the Mexican title. The commissioners confirmed the Mexican title; and under that confirmation nearly all the parties, I believe, who were embraced in the memorial, went on to the lands and made purchase of this title, paying a valuable consideration. In addition to that they have expended three or four hundred thousand dollars in fencing and planting their orchards and vineyards, and in making improvements of various character.

The United States appealed from the judgment of the commissioners to the district court of the United States, and the decision of the commissioners was reversed. The claimants appealed from the decision of the district court, and carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is now pending. The claimants are now here asking that they may be permitted to enter their lands, paying the minimum price, $1 25 per acre. It is due to the House that I should state that some of these individuals have more land within their inclosures than would be allowed under the general land law, by which one hundred and sixty acres constitute the limit. I believe that there are two of the claimants who have something like two thousand acres each.

The application of these parties for this legislation is based on the same principle that was involved in one or two cases that were before Congress at the last session. Under a title supposed to have been guaranteed by the Government of the United States, a title of a peculiar character, these parties have gone on and made purchases of these lands and put their improvements upon them. Their claim does not meet with any opposition from individuals. They simply ask that they shall be allowed to enter these lands at the Government price, the United States giving them an undisputed title. These are the simple facts.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I shall not urge any objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET BRADY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely upon the petition of Margaret Brady, of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, praying for a pension on account of the services of her late husband.

The petition was laid on the table.

ILLUMINATION OF THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the President of the United States having ordered the Department buildings to be illuminated this evening in honor of the late victories for the Union, the Vice President and the Speaker, on consultation this morning, deemed it fitting that this Capitol should also be illuminated, and directed the Commissioner of Public Buildings to make the requisite arrangements for this purpose. It was necessary that the work of preparation should be commenced before either House of Congress would be in session.

NATIONAL MISSISSIPPI BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be House bill No. 634, to incorporate the National Mississippi Bridge Company, on which the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I hope that my colleague will withdraw the demand for the previous question, as it is a matter in which Illinois is deeply interested.

Mr. NORTON. I would be happy to accommodate my colleague, but I cannot.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. NORTON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Does my colleague know that Illinois has chartered a company to build this bridge, in connection with a company chartered by the State of Missouri? I ask whether this is not an independent company, for the purpose of depriving Illinois and Missouri of the benefit of building this bridge.

Mr. NORTON. I cannot hear my colleague.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Does not my colleague know that the State of Illinois has recently chartered a company in conjunction with a company chartered by the State of Missouri, and that it has authorized it to build this bridge across the Mississippi river? Does he not know that this is a scheme to deprive the State of Illinois of a voice in a work in which it is deeply interested?

Mr. NORTON. I am glad to answer my colleague. I will state to him that when I reported this bill there was not to my knowledge a charter granted by the State of Illinois to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river. He knew, when he put the question to me, that neither he nor myself knew there was any project passed by the Illinois Legislature until yesterday afternoon. None of us knew that any such proposition had passed the Illinois Legislature. I knew nothing about it, and I do not know that my colleague did. I do not know it now, except that my colleague intimated to me that such a bill had passed ver-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 63.

terday, or that such a bill had been before the Illinois Legislature.

Further than that, this bill has no intention to cut out any other corporation in the State of Missouri or the State of Illinois. I am not aware there is any company to build this bridge across the Mississippi river except the one proposed in this bill. And I am astonished that my colleague should put such a question to me. He knows that the first intimation I had that this matter had been before the Illinois Legislature was given by him to me yesterday afternoon, after this bill had been under discussion.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I hope that my colleague will understand that I meant no reflection on him. I made the statement for the information of the House. I was told that the Illinois Legislature was acting on this subject. I was not advised until yesterday what was the result of their legislation. I inquired of the proper source, and I was informed that they had chartered a company to build a bridge across the Mississippi river. I see that the names of the corporators in this bill are of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri. Illinois is as much interested in this bridge as Missouri, and there are the names of none of the citizens of that State here. But this bill, in assuming the authority of the United States, is to deprive those two States of a voice through their Legislatures in the building of this bridge. It is for that reason I have propounded these inquiries to my colleague. I hope that this House will not undertake to overthrow the legislation of Missouri and Illinois by passing at this time an act of this kind.

Mr. NORTON. I yielded to my colleague for a question, and not for a speech.

So far as the corporators being citizens of Missouri, if my colleague will suggest the names of citizens of Illinois, I will insert them in lieu of others. I am willing to do that. Further than that, my colleague does not pretend to know that a bill has passed the Illinois Legislature, or what is the character of the legislation of Illinois on this subject.

But I am not going into a discussion of this matter. The object of the bill is to provide for saving any conflict of State jurisdiction. The authority of Congress is paramount over the business and commerce of the country. This bill brings the company under the jurisdiction of the United States exclusively, and there will be no conflict between sovereign States. The bill further provides that the bridge shall not interfere with the navigation of the river; that the bridge shall be built seventy feet above the highest water, which was in 1844; and further, that it shall not interfere with the navigation of the Mississippi river in any respect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not see the bill now before the House until this morning, for I was not here yesterday, being detained from the House on the business of the House. It is certainly a very important bill, involving important principles, and the interests of the State of Illinois, to a very considerable degree. As my colleague has the bill now before the House, I would be very glad to have him postpone its consideration for a short time, until we can have an opportunity of looking at it carefully and to see what action the Legislature of Illinois has taken upon this same subject. The seventh section provides in reference to the rates of toll, and I think the Representatives of the State of Illinois ought to consider very carefully whether we shall authorize this bridge to be made, and authorize it to impose a heavy tax upon the citizens of Illinois who go into Missouri for purposes of business.

Mr. NORTON. It is very well understood that this whole question was raised yesterday. I tell my colleague that I assured the House yesterday that if this bill could be made a special order for any given day, so that a postponement would not be virtually killing the bill, I would have no objection to postponing it. But every one knows that we cannot postpone this bill except to a day certain without giving it the go-by for the whole session; much less can we postpone it until we hear from Illinois, to learn whether there has been any legislation there, and whether this bill interferes with any bill which may be passed by the Illinois Legislature.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If there is no opposition to this bill, and if it does not conflict with the guaranteed right of the free navigation of the Mississippi, why is this application made to Congress for a charter?

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman asks, if there is no opposition to this bill anywhere, why application is made to Congress? The reason why they have come to Congress and asked their action on the question is, that the question affects the interests of two States, Illinois and Missouri; and they wanted to avoid any conflict between the separate interests of the two States.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I understand there is no conflict or opposition. I ask the gentleman again, why then come to Congress and ask these extraordinary privileges?

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman is confounding the two ideas of conflict of interest and conflict of jurisdiction. I do not know that there is any conflict of interest; but there may be a conflict of jurisdiction between the two States; and there might be two charters granted, one by one State, and one by the other.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his demand for the previous question.

Mr. NORTON. We shall avoid all the difficulties which have been suggested by this legislation. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to dispose of this matter in some way, as it is taking up all the time to which the Committee for the District of Columbia is entitled.

Mr. NORTON. I will do it by adhering to my demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I appeal to the gentleman to yield to a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just stated that he will not yield.

Mr. HOOPER. I appeal to the gentleman to answer me a question.

Mr. NORTON. I cannot yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts and refuse the gentleman from Ohio. I demand still the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. PENDLETON obtained the floor.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. This bill is taking up the time of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I hope it may be postponed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is upon the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. To what time would the gentleman postpone it?

Mr. STEELE, of New York. To any time the gentleman may indicate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield to the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I move to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. NORTON. I call for tellers.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order to move to postpone until Monday next?

The SPEAKER. It would not, a motion to postpone indefinitely being now pending, on which the House is dividing.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. NORTON and PENDLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 39.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the vote by which the bill was postponed be reconsidered; and also that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order during the remainder of the morning hour from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

INCORPORATION OF WASHINGTON CITY.

On motion of Mr. DUMONT, and by unanimous consent, an act (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OPENING OF SIXTH STREET WEST.

On motion of Mr. DUMONT, by unanimous consent, bill of the House No. 364, authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, as follows:

Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, however, That Sixth street through the public grounds known as Armory square shall not be opened until after the removal of the Army hospital from such public grounds, or until the consent of the Surgeon General of the United States Army shall be first had and obtained.

POTOMAC BRIDGE AND CENTER MARKET.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning the Potomac bridge and the Center market; which was read a first and second time.

The bill requires the Secretary of War to cause the iron rails now used for the railroad track across the Potomac bridge to be removed therefrom as soon as possible, and to be laid down upon the railroad bridge recently erected across the Potomac river near the Potomac bridge, and that, as soon as the said rails are removed, the care of the Potomac bridge shall revert to the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in whose custody it is by law placed, who shall appoint the draw-keepers heretofore authorized by law.

The bill also appropriates $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the repair of the bridge, provided that the corporation of the city of Washington appropriate a like sum for the same purpose.

The bill further provides for the removal of the present Center market-house, and the building of a new market-house, the site thereof to be selected by the President.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill contains an appropriation of $5,000. I desire to reserve the right to raise a point of order on this bill until I can hear from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I would state to the gentleman from Indiana that this appropriation of $5,000 is an appropriation for the purpose of putting in repair the Long Bridge, which has recently broken down; but the bill provides that no part of the $5,000 shall be expended until a similar amount is raised and placed to the credit of the United States by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SISTERS OF MERCY.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 368, to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

*Mr. PATTERSON. I have been instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back a House bill, but there is a Senate bill (No. 421) of precisely the same nature upon the Speaker's table, and I ask that it be taken up and put upon its passage.

No objection was made; and bill of the Senate No. 421, to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind, approved February 16, 1857, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The bill provides for repealing so much of the act of incorporation of the Columbian Institution as requires the teaching of the blind, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause all indigent blind children who are or may hereafter become entitled, under the laws it now exists, to instruction in that institution to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind in Maryland or some other State, provided that the cost for each pupil shall not be more than that paid for the time being for similar pupils in such State.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate bill No. 441, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," with sundry amendments thereto.

The first amendment was to strike out the words in the first section, "also a double or single-track railway, commencing at the intersection of D street north and Four-and-a-half street west."

The second amendment was to insert in the first section, just before the proviso, the words "and the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company shall have the right to charge the same rate of fare as is herein allowed to be charged by the Metropolitan Railroad Company."

The third amendment was to strike out of section five the words "extended to every other railroad in the District of Columbia," and insert the word "repealed;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the provision prohibiting any exclusion from any car on account of color, already applicable to the Metropolitan railroad, is hereby repealed.

Mr. ODELL. I would ask my colleague what the rate of fare will be under the second amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. It will be eight cents.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Raising the fare about one hundred per cent.

Mr. ODELL. That is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I would ask a separate vote on the last amendment.

The first amendment was then agreed to.

The second amendment was again read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have only to say that the stock of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company is now worth four hundred per cent. premium; and yet it is proposed that we shall raise the fare to the public, while we have passes in our pockets.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. It is very easy for gentlemen on this floor to make assertions, and yet to understand very little of the truth of what they utter. But when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] asserts here that the stock of this company is held at four hundred per cent. premium, he asserts what he may perhaps believe to be true, but what is in fact absolutely false.

The great argument in favor of this amendment is this: in consequence of the increase in the value of all the materials which enter into the construction and maintenance of the road, and of all articles employed in the equipment of the road, this company has been doing business during the last year at a heavy loss. And I undertake to say, from some little personal knowledge upon the subject, that there is scarcely a horse railroad in the United States which to-day is paying its expenses where the fare is limited to five cents. In regard to the article of railroad iron, which cost when this road was constructed $50 per ton, it now costs in your markets from $175 to $190 a ton; horses which were then bought at an average of about $80 each now cost from $150 to $160 each. Labor was then worth from seven to nine shillings a day; it now commands $2 50 a day. And every other item of construction and equipment has advanced in the same ratio.

Relief to these roads has been granted in other cases in this country; the Legislatures of States and the common councils of our cities have interfered for the protection of public interests and the interests of these roads, and it is but just that the Congress of the United States should not compel companies within the limits of the capital to do business at a loss. I know it may be asserted that perhaps the stock of this company represents more than the original and actual cost of the road. Now that may be very true. But suppose it is; that stock has been transferred from those who constructed the road, and has now come into the hands of parties who have paid par or a premium for that stock. They are innocent holders of that stock, and it is no answer to say that this company may originally have made money out of this transaction.

The one point to consider is this: can the company run this road and furnish the accommodation which the public demand without losing money at the present cost of construction, equipment, and maintenance? I maintain that that cannot be done, and the books of this company, a transcript of which I have had an opportunity of examining, show that the losses of this company for the last six months have been more than twelve thousand dollars. This loss was incurred in attempting to supply the wants of the public by furnishing proper facilities for communication between different parts of the metropolis.

The Metropolitan Railroad Company, for which this bill asks relief, has barely commenced operations. I venture to say that it has not yet, on any two days since it has been in operation, received money enough to pay its running expenses. And when Congress proposes, as a matter of justice and equity, to allow this company to increase its fare to eight cents, it is proper that the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company should be permitted to do the same thing; for it is very evident that if the latter company be limited to a fare of five cents, the Metropolitan Railroad Company cannot charge more than five cents and obtain passengers.

I believe it to be a matter of justice and equity that this bill should pass, that this relief should be extended. It will rest within the power of Congress, hereafter, when times shall change, when our currency shall be in a different condition from that which now exists, to impose such restrictions upon the rate of fare as shall be equitable and just.

I am no friend to injustice. I am no friend to a false and miserable and contemptible economy. I remember that at the last session there was introduced here a measure proposing that the Congress of the United States should appropriate $4,000 toward the purchase of a steam fire-engine for the use of the District of Columbia and for the protection of the public buildings in the capital. That proposition was earnestly, and I regret to say successfully, opposed by the honorable gentleman from Illinois. Had that proposition been adopted the public buildings might have been safe; the Smithsonian Institution might have been protected. Sir, the towers of that institution, scathed and blackened by the flames, stand to-day as a monument to the comprehensive sagacity and liberality of the honorable gentleman from Illinois.

Sir, I believe that we should be generous and just; that, while guarding our expenditures with a reasonable spirit of frugality, we should be willing to do what is necessary for the public interest, and what is due to those enterprises which demand protection in these peculiar times.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the act incorporating the Metropolitan Railroad Company, and provides that that company may charge a fare of eight cents. This is a new road, which I believe is well conducted, but which is having a rather hard time to get along. I do not know that I should be disposed to make any objection with regard to that. But when it is proposed to incorporate in this bill a provision to raise the rate of fare upon the Washington and Georgetown railroad to eight cents, I think that very few members of this House will be willing to adopt it.

Now, sir, the statement which I made was made upon information which I deemed to be correct; and I have within a moment been assured by a gentleman that one of the stockholders of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company told him in conversation that the stock of this company was worth four hundred per cent. premium. Although every member is aware of the immense travel upon this line, although a member cannot one time in five get a seat in these cars, this company has, within a few days, as I understand, taken off eight cars, thus failing to afford proper facilities for the travel upon the road. Yet we are asked to tax the people of this District, and tax those of our constituents who may be here, and tax the soldiers, by allowing this company to increase its fare to eight cents, instead of five. I think the proposition needs only to be stated to be voted down by this House.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition of the gentleman does need to be proved. It is not sufficient simply to state such a proposition; it should be demonstrated, especially if as broad as that made by the gentleman from Illinois.

When this matter with reference to the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company was before this House last winter I sympathized with the position taken by my honorable friend, supposing at the time that this company was making immense profits. But from facts which have since come to my knowledge I am satisfied that I was then entirely mistaken. I do not propose to lay before the House unfounded opinions and prejudices, but facts. I ask that the Clerk shall read a statement made before the committee by the president of that company, showing its receipts and expenditures during two quarters only.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Comparative statement of the business of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad for the quarter ending February 1, 1864, and the quarter ending February 1, 1865.

Receipts for quarter ending February 1, 1864.....	$81,115 10

GEORGE S. GIDEON, President.
February 10, 1865.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BILLS.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to yield to me for the purpose of taking certain Senate bills from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for that purpose.

There being no objection, the following joint resolution and bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

An act (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes;

An act (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter;

An act (S. No. 167) to incorporate an insurance company in the city of Washington;

An act (S. No. 386) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company, of the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 113) authorizing certain banks in the District of Columbia to accept the provisions of an act therein named.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen from the paper read at the Clerk's desk that this company has lost over $18,000 during the quarter ending February 1, 1865.

It has been stated that the fare was five cents. Now, sir, the average price of a ticket, taking into account the transfers given on this road, is only three and a half cents. And, sir, I say without fear of contradiction that no road in this city, no road in any other city of the United States, can make money or continue to operate at that rate of fare. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to put the price of the tickets of the Metropolitan Railroad Company at a higher rate, while the price of the tickets of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company shall remain what it now is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not mean to propose anything of the kind. Now, I ask my friend whether, if the revenue bill passes the Senate as it has passed the House, and becomes a law, the fare will not really be nine cents instead of eight; for they are there authorized in the case of a fraction to charge the whole amount.

Mr. PATTERSON. If so, we will put it at seven cents, as the company desire but eight, and as that will be more convenient in making change than nine. Let me remind the gentleman, however, that the bill provides that tickets shall be sold in packages of sixteen for a dollar. That would give only six and a quarter cents per ticket. But as I have shown, the real price of tickets at the present time is really only three and a half cents—that is, on the Washington and Georgetown road—on account of the granting of transfers. Suppose, now, we allow the Metropolitan road to charge eight cents while the Washington and Georgetown road is allowed to charge only five cents; travel would gravitate to Pennsylvania avenue, and all who ride would pass over the latter road. Our desire is to pass a bill which will give some relief to the new road.

I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Metropolitan Railroad Company. It will show that it is losing $651 75 a week, and unless this relief is granted the company will be compelled to throw up the road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend then means to make this bestowment on the Washington and Georgetown railroad because of the Metropolitan railroad.

Mr. PATTERSON. Not at all. It has been shown that the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company have lost, the last quarter, over $18,000.

Mr. UPSON. That was an ex parte statement. Mr. PRUYN. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire whether the difficulty would not be removed by allowing the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company to charge say three cents on the side lines? If any road in the world is paying, this road must be on the main line along the avenue. The gentleman says, in consequence of giving these transfer tickets without charge the income of the main road is exhausted. Would it not be a remedy to allow it to charge three cents on the branch roads?

Mr. PATTERSON. That would meet the wants of the Washington and Georgetown road, but it would not meet the wants of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, because it has no branch road, and would tend to throw travel on to the avenue.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, I am decidedly opposed to increasing the fare of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company. I think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is very much mistaken when he says that the stock of this road is worth $400. I think that it is about one and a half as held by innocent holders.

I am willing, as a member of that committee, to allow the company to charge three cents for transfer tickets, but I am not willing to increase the fare on the main line. If the stockholders of the Metropolitan Railroad Company have made a bad investment it is no reason why we should raise the fare on the citizens of this District.

Mr. PATTERSON. I cannot yield any longer. It has been shown that the company is constantly losing money by running this road at the present rates.

Now, so far as this Washington and Georgetown road is concerned, the difficulty might be met by giving them permission to charge for transfer tickets, but that would be doing wrong to the Metropolitan road. We ought to meet the difficulty in a way which shall not do injustice to either party. I will now ask the Clerk to read the paper which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Statement of weekly expenses and receipts of Metropolitan Railroad for week ending February 8, 1865, and showing cost of running street cars at present time.

Pay-roll for week.....	$739 05
Feed bill and straw for one week.....	560 00
	1,299 05
Wear and necessary repairs on cars.....	50 40
Wear of harness, lubricating and illuminating oil, expense of keeping road in working order, and loss of horses by bad roads, with depreciation of stock and cars per week, actual cost,	105 10
Actual cost.....	1,454 55
Interest at six per cent. on the cost of road, (actually expended,) $200,000, is per week.....	230 70
	1,685 25
Weekly receipts.....	$1,060 00
Less Government tax, 2½ per cent....	26 50
Actual weekly loss.....	$651 75

The within statement does not include the loss by death of horses. Since the road commenced running five horses have died, costing $700. The severity of the winter has kept an average of twelve horses on the sick list unfit for use. The actual cost of running car per diem is $20 06 each.

Mr. PATTERSON. It will be seen by this statement, drawn up by a director of the road, that the price of hay has risen from sixteen or seventeen dollars to fifty dollars a ton during the last three years. The price of labor is $2 50 a day. It was only $1 50 before the war. Everything else which the road uses has risen in the same proportion. It would seem, therefore, but simple justice that the rate of fares should be increased in the same ratio. I know, from facts which were before a committee, that this Metropolitan road must cease running their cars unless aid is soon extended to them. Why, sir, iron which cost only forty-five dollars a ton when the Washington and Georgetown road was built, cost this road $164 a ton; and the increase upon the price of lumber and other materials used in the construction of the road was equal to the rise upon iron.

Gentlemen say there has been a great increase upon the par value of the stock of the Washington and Georgetown road. That may be so; but the majority of the present stockholders bought it at an advance upon the original cost, and they have not realized any great increase upon their original investment.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over. Reports from the Judiciary Committee are in order for the remainder of the day.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 450) for the relief of Samuel Gerould;

An act (S. No. 422) for the relief of William Pierce;

An act (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. & C. S. Duncan; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 109) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of George J. Stubblefield for chewing tobacco furnished to the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following joint resolution and bill of the House, severally with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command; and

An act (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT JURORS.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 609) to prescribe the mode of designating the citizens of the United States who shall serve as jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States.

The substitute was read, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERNAN moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TITLES TO LAND IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back an act (S. No. 91) to quiet titles in favor of parties in actual possession of land situated in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. MALLORY. If I understand that bill it subverts the laws protecting the rights of married women and heirs, the owners of real estate in the District of Columbia. I understand that where a conveyance on record of a feme covert has not been made in improper form heretofore, and where conveyances of land sold in the District of Columbia are defective, the bill cures all defects, and makes the titles all perfect. It divests rights which have grown up in this District under the law, and that, too, in relation to a class of persons who deserve the protection of law as much, if not more, than any other: I mean married women. I can never give my sanction to a law of that sort. I must see this bill in print and examine it more closely before I can ever be induced to do it.

The bill goes further, as I understand it. Where a conveyance has been made by an attorney and the proceedings under the power of attorney have been wrong and improper, it validates such conveyances, when, such conveyances being invalid as the law now stands, rights have sprung up, and this bill deprives the parties of these rights which they have acquired under the existing law.

I cannot be induced to vote for such a bill. It is true there is a saving clause in the bill authorizing parties having such claims to sue within three years, but if they do not do that then the operation of this bill is to make all such defective titles valid titles.

Mr. ASHLEY. I suggest that this bill ought to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to make a brief statement. I desire to say that I have been uniformly opposed to this kind of legislation, unless great care is exercised. This bill was carefully examined by the Committee on the Judiciary before they recommended its passage. This is a Senate bill. It simply provides for confirming the titles of parties who are already in possession, but whose acknowledgments have been defective. Any gentleman who should attempt to understand the laws relating to the acknowledgment of deeds in this District would find himself considerably involved. In some cases, where the law required the acknowledgment to be made before two justices of the peace or aldermen, the acknowledgments have been made before one, and sometimes before a judge of a District court, rather than before a judge of a United States court. This bill only provides that where the deeds are on record and the parties under them are in possession, and where there has been this defect in the form of the acknowledgment or in the certificate, then the title shall be good. It expressly provides that it shall not affect a married woman, unless there shall be equivalent words to her having acknowledged the deed apart from her husband and freely.

And then the second section provides that it shall not affect any suit pending or any suit which shall be brought within three years.

Now, all that I can say in behalf of the committee is this: we learned that this bill had been very carefully considered in the Senate by a very able lawyer and former judge, Mr. COLLAMER.

The Senator from Maryland, Mr. JOHNSON, who is familiar with the laws in this District and in Maryland, said that it had been examined and is right, and that it only confirms acknowledgments apparently defective on the record, but which were really good and ought to be confirmed.

Now, in reference to one clause of the bill, it declares that where an attorney of a corporation who is authorized to convey title has omitted to state in his certificate that he acknowledged it in behalf of the corporation the title is made good. I consulted Mr. Carlisle, a counselor of high standing in this District, and I was informed by him that attention had been called to this bill, that it had been examined by lawyers here, and that there is no objection to its passage.

Now, that is all the information that I can give or that the committee can give. We have endeavored to be very careful. We have not desired to legislate for any cases where there ought not to be legislation. We supposed that if upon the record there were acknowledgments which from the certificates appeared to be defective, but where in reality everything essential had been complied with, the titles ought to be confirmed.

Now, I do not desire to persuade any one to vote for this bill if he thinks it ought not to be passed. If it is desired by the House that this bill shall be printed for their information I presume there will be no objection, although I do not think they will be any wiser by it; for I spent a great deal of time in reading this bill and trying to understand it.

Mr. MALLORY. It seems to me that the object of the bill, as the gentleman states it, is to perfect by law imperfect titles in cases where femes covert have failed to make a proper acknowledgment, or to take the steps which the law requires. I would suggest to the gentleman, who is a learned lawyer, that those titles can now be made perfect by going before the proper officer and having the proper acknowledgments made. If any woman is opposed to doing that, it is because she thinks she has been wrongfully deprived of that title.

Mr. KERNAN. In the first place, I do not think there is a State in this Union that has not, time and time again, passed laws to cure these formal defects.

Mr. MALLORY. There has been no such legislation in my State.

Mr. KERNAN. It has been done in other States; it has been done in Maryland. Every gentleman knows that it is a very great burden to impose upon a party in possession, where any one disputes his title, and where there is on record an apparent defect in the title which would prevent his selling or mortgaging his property, to require him to run all over the United States, or even all over the State of Maryland, to find some one from whom to get a proper acknowledgment. Is it right to permit the feme covert to compel the owner to pay her again, and to exact something from him before she will consent to make his title good, when in reality she has already parted with that title, or intended to do so? Unless the House shall desire it, I will move the previous question.

Mr. NOBLE moved to lay the bill on the table. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] to withdraw his call for the previous question and allow me to move that this bill be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KERNAN. I will do so, if the motion is made to include the right of the committee to report upon it at any time.

Mr. MALLORY. I will make that motion. The motion to print was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington;

An act (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City and State of Nevada for the purpose of a branch mint located in said place.

EMILE COHEN.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to change the name of Emile Cohen of Washington, District of Columbia, to Emile Cornely.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

INSANE HOSPITAL IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of the superintendent of the Insane Hospital in the District of Columbia by the President; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 758) amendatory of the act relative to the Attorney General's office, and to fix the compensation of his assistant and clerks, with sundry amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out of the first section "$4,000" and insert "$3,500" as the salary of the Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask what is the full effect of the section as proposed to be amended.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I would state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the Senate have already provided in a bill before them that the salary of the Assistant Attorney General shall be $3,500, instead of $3,000, as now provided by law. The present condition of the country has brought before that office far more questions to decide than formerly, and the business of that office is now of such magnitude that the Committee on the Judiciary, upon investigation, deem it only just that the Assistant Attorney General should have a compensation of $3,500. That amount was recommended by the Attorney General, and it only places the Assistant Attorney General upon an equal footing with those occupying similar positions in the other Departments. It is certainly a very responsible office, one that ought to command the services of a person learned in the law, and in my judgment a salary of $3,500 is quite as small as it ought to be.

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to offer an amendment to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior to $3,500.

The SPEAKER. That amendment would not be in order, not being germane to the bill.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I would state further that this bill is intended to reorganize the Attorney General's Department, and make it correspond with the other Departments of the Government. It seems to have had no perfect and thorough organization under the laws heretofore passed; and hence this bill has met the approval of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee are certainly an improvement upon the original bill. My objection was to the increase of salary at all; but still I think it better to adopt the amendments. I admit that the expenses of the office have increased enormously since the commencement of the war. If I did not apprehend that an attempt to defeat it would only defeat the modifications reported by the Judiciary Committee I would move to lay it on the table, but as I conceive that the amendments are much better than the bill I shall not make that motion.

The question was taken on the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary; and it was agreed to.

The next amendment, to strike out the third section of the bill, was also agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OPINIONS OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill No. 707, to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, the question being on ordering it to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill directs the Attorney General to contract for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States given since the 4th of March, 1857, of uniform style and appearance with the eighth volume of such opinions, published by Robert Farnham in 1858, and as nearly as possible of uniform size; the whole to be numbered on regularly after the eighth volume, the copyright to be taken out by the publisher, who is to deliver to the Attorney General, within one month after the publication, three hundred sets, at the price of three dollars per volume. It authorizes the Attorney General to employ a competent person to edit and prepare and index such opinions and to supervise their publication. The Attorney General is to cause them to be distributed as directed in the bill, the residue of the set to remain at the future direction of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have a letter from the Attorney General read in explanation of the matter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 23, 1865.

SIR: The opinions of the Attorneys General up to the 4th of March, 1857, have, as you are doubtless aware, been published in eight uniform volumes. The opinions delivered since that date have not been published, and remain in this office on its records. These opinions, like those contained in the eight volumes published, relate to and decide a great variety of questions of great interest and frequent occurrence in the various Executive Departments of the Government. By established custom since the foundation of the Government they have been accepted as settling the rule of practice in the executive offices upon the points to which they relate. Hence they constitute a body of departmental law valuable not only for their intrinsic merit, but as precedents which secure uniformity of practice in those offices. Many of these opinions, as is well known to you, are elaborate and carefully considered discussions of grave questions of constitutional and international law, having greater or less intrinsic value, but all delivered under the sanction of official authority, and some of them having the weight of eminent professional names.

These remarks apply as well to the unpublished as to the published opinions. And I may add, in regard to the opinions of my immediate predecessor, that many of them relate to questions which have arisen with the existing rebellion, and furnish rules of practice and decision in the Executive Departments under statutes enacted within the last four years.

Of course the occasion to refer to and examine the unpublished opinions frequently occurs in the Executive Departments, the want of them often occasioning delay and difficulty in the transaction of important and pressing public business, and they are often called for to be used in the United States courts. Hence this office is subjected to constant applications for them, generally from officers in the public service. To supply the demand would draw very largely on the time and labors of our clerical force, which is needed for other duties. The Departments ought to have these opinions; and I have therefore prepared an amendment which I have the honor to submit to you with the request that you will give your aid to Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom I have also sent a copy, in order to have it inserted in some suitable appropriation bill if Congress shall see fit to do so.

The demand for the work being limited, the book publishers inform me that they cannot afford to publish the volumes unless the Government will agree to take the number of copies which, at the price fixed, will compensate for the publication of the work. The publisher will then rely on the copyright granted by the proposed law for his profit. This, I am informed, is in accordance with precedent in the publication of the former volumes.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General.

Hon. JAMES F. WILSON,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa to insert before the word "index" the words "fully and completely." I have noticed in many of our public volumes that the index is most defective.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

The bill was so modified.

Mr. WILSON. I do not desire to add anything further to the explanation contained in the letter from the Attorney General. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to let me suggest an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I will hear what the gentleman has to suggest.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I propose to amend that part of the bill which provides that the residue of the books undistributed shall remain at the future direction of Congress, by providing that they shall remain in charge of the Librarian of Congress, in order that they may be in some definite place and be safely kept until wanted.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot accept the amendment as representing the committee, but I have no objection to its being offered.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I propose that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROPERTY TAKEN FOR PUBLIC USE.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill in relation to the appropriation of private property to the public use; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the provisions of an act in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals, approved April 19, 1864, shall extend to, and be construed as applying to, all cases wherein the Government of the United States may deem it necessary to appropriate private property, being real estate, to the use of the Government, and in relation to which the Government and the owner or owners of such property are not able to agree to the price; provided that the board of commissioners shall be appointed by the circuit court for the circuit in which the proceedings are to be had.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to regulate the taking of depositions in certain cases; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments a bill (S. No. 88) entitled "An act regulating proceeding in criminal cases, and for other purposes."

The first amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Immediately after the enacting clause insert the following as the first section:

That every grand jury impaneled before any district or circuit court of the United States to inquire into and make presentment of public offenses against the United States, committed or triable within the district for which the court is holden, shall consist of not less than sixteen, and not exceeding twenty-three, persons. If, of the persons summoned, less than sixteen attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury; and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately or for a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury. And whenever a challenge to an individual grand juror is allowed, and there are not other jurors in attendance sufficient to complete the grand jury, the court shall make a like order to the marshal to summon a sufficient number of persons for that purpose. No indictment shall be found, nor shall any presentment be made, without the concurrence of at least twelve grand jurors.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to give some explanation of this amendment. I did not understand entirely that provision with regard to the attendance of less than sixteen.

Mr. WILSON. If less than sixteen attend, those who do attend are held, and the remaining number are made up of persons summoned from the body of the district. The reason for proposing this provision is, that the United States judge for the district of Oregon has decided that a grand jury composed of seven persons, as provided in the laws of that State, is sufficient to find an indictment for an offense against the laws of the United States. In order to avoid any difficulty of that kind in any other districts we now propose to adopt this provision.

Another object of the amendment is to prevent a grand jury from being made up of professional jurors—men who are constantly hanging about the court-rooms all over the country. It is therefore provided that jurors shall be taken from the body of the district.

Mr. SLOAN. That explanation is satisfactory. The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

In the second and third lines of the first section of the original bill strike out the words "in any district or circuit court of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

B. C. WHITING.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) relating to the account of B. C. Whiting.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the joint resolution the following: Provided, That such amount shall not exceed the sum of $650.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a written report accompanying this bill?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. There are affidavits accompanying the bill. I may also add that I have consulted with the Attorney General on this subject. It is supposed that there is merit in this claim; but the bill only proposes that the whole subject be referred to that officer, and that if he shall find the claim just it should be paid, provided that it shall not exceed the sum of $650.

Mr. HOLMAN. These claims all stand on the same footing; and in the absence of a report I think that this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COLE, of California. There was an attempt to eject the light-house keeper at Point Pinos, near Monterey, California. That light-house is or was upon private property, and the light-house keeper naturally applied to the district attorney of the United States to defend him in possession of the property, that the lights might be kept up. This was outside of the duty of the district attorney. There was no time to consult with the authorities here in Washington; but he was requested by the other United States officers to proceed and defend the light-house keeper in his possession. He did it, and he performed valuable service to the Government, beyond question. He saved the Government a vast amount of expense and trouble. This labor was not within the scope of his duty as district attorney of the United States.

Again: persons squatted upon the custom-house lands at Monterey, and like application was made to him. On the solicitation of the United States authorities, he proceeded to defend them. It was no part of his duty. These suits properly belonged to the Treasury Department.

It does not make any new appropriation, as I understand the resolution, but allows his payment to be made out of appropriations heretofore made. He is to be allowed such sum as may be deemed just. The sum proposed is very moderate. I will state further that he is out of pocket in the matter. He has lost money by his services on behalf of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is he not the district attorney? Mr. COLE, of California. He is. This was not in the line of his duty. He is not the attorney of the Treasury Department. The communication between here and California is so long that great injury would be done before application could be made to the Treasury Department for the employment of an attorney there to defend suits of this nature.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the gentleman is wrong in saying that this does not make an appropriation. If the money is to be paid out of appropriations heretofore made I do not object.

Mr. COLE, of California. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that this is an additional appropriation of money, and it is not to be paid out of money heretofore appropriated.

Mr. COLE, of California. It refers the matter to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It directs this money to be paid.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be paid until it has been appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the resolution be amended so as to make the money payable out of former appropriations.

Mr. COLE, of California. I do not object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WRITS OF ERROR ON APPEALS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 638, to facilitate judicial proceedings on writs of error and appeals, with amendments.

The amendments were severally concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 740, to establish the supremacy of the Constitution in the insurrectionary States, with the following substitute:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That neither the people nor the Legislature of any State, the people of which were declared to be in insurrection against the United States by the proclamation of the President, dated August 16, 1861, shall hereafter elect Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States until the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States within such State has ceased; nor until the people of such State shall have adopted a constitution of government not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States; nor until, by a law of Congress, such State shall have been declared to be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States of America.

Mr. MALLORY. I make the point of order that this whole subject was laid on the table yesterday.

The SPEAKER. That bill and amendments were laid on the table, but that does not preclude the committee reporting back any measure expressly referred to it.

Mr. MALLORY. This is substantially the same subject.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to decide whether it will lay this on the table or not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the bill and substitute be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot. I desire to have a vote upon this bill, and am willing, in order to secure that vote, to yield my time to such gentlemen as may desire to express their views in relation to it, reserving to myself a very small portion of the hour to express my views and explain the features of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I do not desire to yield to such a motion. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] has raised a point of order upon this bill, I will state that it is different in its provisions from either of the bills which were laid upon the table yesterday. It is entirely different in principle from the substitute which I offered to the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], and it is entirely different in its framework from the bill reported by that gentleman, inasmuch as it does not prescribe any of the conditions contained in that bill. The principle upon which this bill is based is that springing from that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to prescribe regulations in relation to the time and mode of electing members of the Senate and House of Representatives, as found in section four of the first article of the Constitution. The Constitution says:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The committee reported this substitute for the purpose of having an exercise, upon the part of Congress, of the power here conferred, to determine the time of electing Senators and Representatives within the States heretofore declared to be in insurrection. It is true that the substitute does not fix the particular date, nor the particular day of the year for this election; but it provides that an election shall not take place until the happening of certain events, after which the President by proclamation fixes the time when the States may proceed to this election. The substitute provides that neither the people nor the Legislature of any State, the people of which were declared to be in insurrection against the United States by the proclamation of the President, dated August 16, 1861, shall elect Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States until the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States within such State has ceased; nor until the people of such State shall have adopted a constitution of government not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States; nor until, by a law of Congress, such State shall have been declared to be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States of America.

Mr. POMEROY. I would inquire of the gentleman whether any action of Congress, under the clause of the Constitution which he has read, must not be uniform in its action throughout the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think it necessary; if I did I should not have based this substitute upon that provision of the Constitution, because it would have been in conflict with it.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose the President does not choose to declare, by proclamation, the facts prescribed in the substitute the gentleman has offered, would he not have the power to prevent the representation here of any State? And I would inquire whether it is any part of the power conferred upon the President of the United States to deprive any State of representation here.

Mr. WILSON. I do not suppose it was intended to do so.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire whether the President has it not in his power, if this bill becomes a law, to prevent any one of those States from ever having a representative in Congress?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; he will have no such power under this bill.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the bill to declare expressly that there shall be no election in these States until the President shall have made the proclamation. Then if the President should not so declare, there could be no election.

Mr. WILSON. The state of facts which the gentleman suggests might call for a remedy if the President should fail to do that which it would be his duty to do under the bill. If, for instance, at the next session of Congress, we should determine it proper to admit Representatives, or permit the people of those States to elect Representatives, and the President should not issue his proclamation, we can change the law. We are conferring power upon him which may not at any time be taken away. It is to be presumed that the President will discharge his duty faithfully, and in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. As I understand the gentleman, his bill is based upon the presumption that the President of the United States will do what to us seems to be his duty. Now, I have only to say that when the Constitution was formed its framers did not seem to think that that was enough, but they thought it proper and necessary to throw some safeguards around the people. And I submit that when my friend from Iowa says that the case which I suggested may call for a remedy he concedes that it is possible for the President, under this bill and until another law shall be passed to cure the mischief, by his own act to deprive a State of representation here.

Mr. WILSON. It is possible for the President to disobey the injunctions of every law passed by Congress, and if he should do so the remedy is in the hands of Congress. There is no more reason for presuming that the President will not do his duty in this regard than there is for presuming that he will not do it in any other respect or in every other.

Mr. DAWES. What law will the President disobey in omitting to declare what you say there shall be no representation until he does declare?

Mr. WILSON. Why, Mr. Speaker, this bill would be passed for a particular purpose, for the purpose of defining the time when these States may engage in the election of Senators and Representatives; and when the state of facts shall occur which would require the issuance of such a proclamation, it would be the duty of the President to issue such a proclamation.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman intend to allow discussion on this bill? I want to make a few remarks.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, certainly. I have already said that I will yield the most of my time to gentlemen who desire it.

Mr. MALLORY. May I have the floor now to make a few remarks?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly. All I ask is that no one gentleman shall consume too much of the time, for I want to divide it. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky want?

Mr. MALLORY. Not over ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman intend to allow amendments to be offered, or does he intend to call the previous question?

Mr. WILSON. I design to call the previous question at the expiration of my hour.

Mr. COX. Without allowing amendments to be offered?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; I desire a vote upon the bill. I have just refused the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] the privilege of offering an amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, after what has fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], that it is necessary that anything should be said against this bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] admits that the sole effect of the bill will be to place this whole matter in the power and discretion of the President of the United States. So far as these States are concerned there is no limitation, as I contend, on their right now to send Representatives to the Congress of the United States whenever they choose to do it.

This bill adds nothing to the right that those States at present have under their existing constitutions to send Representatives to the Congress of the United States. I contend, then, that the only effect which this bill can have is to restrict the rights of these States, and to place them at the feet of the President of the United States. It provides, in other words, that they shall not send Representatives to this House or to the Senate of the United States until the President of the United States by proclamation says that the rebellion is suppressed within the limits of those States. That is the effect of the bill.

Now, each House of Congress is, under the Constitution, the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, and to-day, or tomorrow, or next week, or a year from this time, when the people of these States choose to lay down their arms and send their Representatives to the Congress of the United States they have a right to send their Representatives to both branches of Congress; and all that each House is called upon to decide, and that they have a right to decide, is whether the members so sent are properly entitled to their seats. There is no restriction, sir, on this right of judgment by both Houses in the Constitution of the United States. There is no restriction in any law that I know of on the exercise of those rights by each State. The gentleman's bill removes no such restriction, because none exists.

The gentleman talks about their adopting constitutions republican in form. They have constitutions republican in form. There is not a State in rebellion now against this Government that has not a constitution as republican in form as that of any State loyal to this Government at this time. I may be asked the question whether, if they have changed the provisions of their constitutions, and made them relate to the confederate government, that fact does not nullify their constitutions, and require them to adopt new ones before they again become members of the Union. No, sir; no, sir. If they have changed their constitutions, and adopted provisions in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, to that extent those provisions are nullities. The constitutions under which they act now are their constitutions in every respect and particular, except where they come in conflict with the Constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof. And so I may be permitted to say of every law that has been passed by any rebel legislature.

If that is not acknowledged to be the case, in what a dilemma will the unfortunate people of those States be left after the rebellion is over. Laws have been passed there relating to marriage, relating to the inheritance of property, relating to all those things which are of the most vital interest to the community. Is it intended that because those States have been in rebellion all their laws shall be, when the rebellion is suppressed, declared to be absolutely null and void, and every marriage contracted in those States, under the operation of their laws, invalid? Why, sir, that would be an outrage. It is an outrage on common sense to propose so.

So of the descent of property, of inheritances, &c. If anything in any one of those laws heretofore passed by their Legislatures shall be found hereafter to conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or with the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, then that provision is null and void. Every one of their laws must be judged by that test, and by that test alone. I see no use in these enabling acts. I see no use in these reconstruction acts. You cannot reconstruct the Union until you recognize that the Union is destroyed. How can you reconstruct a thing already in existence? We contend that those States are still members of the Union; that their acts of secession are null and void, and did not carry the States out of the Union, but that they remained and still are members of the Union.

That is my doctrine, and if it be correct, how are you to bring back by legislation here a State that had never gone out of the Union? I may be dull; but this being my theory, I cannot see why you should enact any law on this subject. Sir, masterly inactivity is your wisest course now. Let things remain as they are under our existing Constitution and law. And when the people of each State choose to send their Representatives here—and I hope it will not be long before they all do so—let us receive their Representatives if we believe that they have been properly elected under the constitutions and laws of those States, and let them engage in the deliberations of this body. Let the President appoint the judges of United States courts and the postmasters. Let Congress put the post routes in those States into operation; and then you will have the whole machinery of Government reestablished in those States as before they engaged in the rebellion. I see no other mode of ending the war and putting a close to the rebellion. For these reasons, sir, no reconstruction bill can be formed that can meet my approbation.

I merely wanted an opportunity to make a statement of these views, that they may go on the record; for on their soundness I am willing to be judged.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration provides—

That neither the people nor the Legislature of any State, the people of which were declared to be in insurrection against the United States by the proclamation of the President, dated August 16, 1861, shall hereafter elect Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States until the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States within such State has ceased; nor until the people of such State shall have adopted a constitution of government not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States; nor until, by a law of Congress, such State shall have been declared to be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States of America.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary claims that we have power to pass this bill under section four of article one of the Constitution. That section declares that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Sir, I deny that this confers the power claimed. I deny that, under the power to make regulations as to time, places, or manner of holding elections, we can prohibit the people of a State from holding an election of Senators and Representatives until the President shall permit an election to be held. This is the purport of the proposed law. Authority to make regulations was not intended to and does not give Congress the power to prohibit any election under any regulation. This bill declares that neither the people nor the Legislature of any State which has been declared to be in insurrection shall hereafter elect Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States, until the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States in such State has ceased.

If we can rightfully do this, we can enact a law that they never shall elect Senators or Representatives until the President issues a proclamation saying that they may do so. It is equivalent to doing this when, by this bill, we declare that certain States shall not elect until the President shall declare that armed hostility has ceased. No President should be intrusted with such power if Congress had authority to grant it. But Congress has not the power—it is well that it has not—to prohibit a State from sending its Representatives here until after the President shall have declared that it may. The President, acting up to the letter and spirit of this law, if it shall be enacted, might prohibit elections when, I am sure, every Union man would desire that elections should be held and Representatives sent here. According to this bill, so long as a guerrilla band is in the State, the President may truthfully refuse to declare that armed hostility toward the United States has ceased.

I insist that if to-morrow the State of Georgia, or any other of these States, should through its organized government, the Legislature and Governor, disavow the ordinance of secession, and declare itself in favor of the Union and against the rebellion, its Representatives here should be received. Is there any Union man in the country who would not welcome its Representatives here? No. And yet if we pass this bill we say that they shall not elect Representatives in the contingencies I have mentioned. Such legislation tends to defer the restoration of the Union and peace, and to perpetuate the war. If, therefore, we have authority to enact such a law it should not be enacted. Our policy should be to induce, by all proper measures, the people of these States to lay down their arms and renew their constitutional connection with the Federal Government by sending Senators and Representatives to Congress under and in accordance with the Constitution. We should in no way repel or embarrass such action on their part; we should invite it. We should pass no law by which it is declared that this House shall not receive as Representatives Union men elected by the Union men of one of these States unless the President shall have authorized their election.

Again, by another provision of this bill there can be no election of Senators or Representatives in either of these States until after an act of Congress has been passed declaring that the State is entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States. Why, sir, no enabling act passed by Congress is required to empower the people of these States to elect Senators and Representatives. These States are in the Union. The people, or a majority of them, are in rebellion against the authority of the Constitution of the United States; they refuse to submit to the United States Government, and have declined to send Representatives to take part in its administration. When they desist from their rebellious and treasonable acts and return to their allegiance they have a right under the Constitution to elect and send here their Representatives; and when these Representatives present themselves, each House by the Constitution is to judge of the election and qualifications of those demanding admission. Each House is to judge for itself. Neither is to consult the other or the President. But if we pass this law and obey it this House cannot admit Representatives from one of these States, although we may be satisfied they are loyal to the Constitution and were properly elected by loyal Union constituencies, because the Senate and President, or even the latter, did not or would not assent to an act of Congress enabling the people of the State to hold an election. Neither House should or rightfully can surrender its constitutional right and duty to exclusively judge of and determine as to the election and qualifications of those asking admission as members. We should enact no law by which the action or assent of the President is made necessary to the admission of Representatives to this body or the Senate. Executive power and influence have increased to an alarming degree. I fear they are increasing, and I believe they should be diminished. Let us not then by act of Congress put it in the power of the Executive to say whether or not States shall be represented in Congress.

The proposed legislation is in my judgment unwise in reference to the present condition of these insurrectionary States. We should take no action which shall tend to prevent, embarrass, or discourage the people of these States or any portion of them, whenever they are disposed to submit to the Constitution and laws, from electing and sending Representatives to Congress. I shall rejoice to see them do so. I believe the friends of the Union everywhere will rejoice to see this evidence of the restoration of the Union under the Constitution; this evidence of Union sentiment among these people; this evidence that the war is drawing to an end and that union and peace among our people will soon be restored. As my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] has well said, we should discard all these unwise reconstruction schemes, these schemes for prescribing conditions as to the return of the people of these States to the Union under the Constitution, and allow matters to remain as they are, so far as legislation on the subject is concerned. At least there should be no legislation apparently hostile to their return. We should wait and deal with the people of each State and their Representatives when the case arises for our action, and should not attempt by act of Congress to prescribe in advance any unbending rule of policy or action on this subject. Certainly wisdom forbids that we should declare that the people of these States shall not hold elections for Senators or Representatives, and send them here to take part in the councils of the Union as Union men, until they have complied with conditions, not required by the Constitution, which we prescribe. I believe the cause of the Union, and the cause of peace based on the Union, which all parties desire so earnestly, will not be promoted by the passage of this bill, or by the policy sought to be inaugurated by a portion of the party in power by the passage of this and similar acts. On the contrary, in my judgment, we should manifest a willingness on our part to receive into Congress the Representatives of the people of any State, so soon as we are satisfied that they represent the people of that State, and that the people of that State, or a majority of them, are opposed to the rebellion, willing to submit to the Constitution and laws made in pursuance of it, and in favor of peace based upon the Union under that Constitution. When they are thus disposed I am in favor of admitting their Representatives here and of allowing them to administer their State governments and local matters with all the rights enjoyed and exercised by the people of the other States.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, my first objection to this bill is that, so far from fixing a time at which an election may be held, it simply prescribes conditions precedent to the holding of an election. It fixes no time whatever, but it prescribes that certain things shall occur before any election shall be held. Now, it is as much within the power of Congress to prescribe that no election shall be held within the State of New York, except by proclamation of the President, and call that fixing a time for an election within the State of New York.

But there is another, and with me it is the principal, objection to this legislation. I sympathize fully with the object which the Committee on the Judiciary have in view. I wish as much as they wish that the time may never come when the States now in rebellion shall again be represented under the constitutions which formerly existed in those States.

I believe that all those constitutions have, by the act of the people of those States, been subverted, are now of no force, and never again can be in force, unless new life be breathed into them through the same instrumentality by which they were overthrown. I believe that as fully as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee; and I desire as much as he does to see the new state of things which will come when slavery shall be wiped out from the seceded States. But my objection to this legislation is that our action upon this whole subject is purely and entirely judicial. The initiative in reorganizing those States is with their people, and not with the Congress of the United States. The people of those States, in whatever way they may elect, whether through some constituted bodies, through conventions legally organized, through legislative action which shall meet the approbation of the people of the States—in whatever way they choose, they may restore political order under such constitutions as they see fit. Under those constitutions they may send Representatives to this House, and they may send Senators to the other. When those Representatives come here, and not till then, are we called upon to determine whether the constitutions under which they come here are republican in form and recognize the supreme authority of the Constitution of the United States, and whether those Representatives have been legally elected, and have the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States. I am not, for my part, disposed to anticipate the fruits of this rebellion.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to know whether the gentleman is in favor of allowing any one of the States now conceded to be in rebellion, and that has had no representation in either end of this Capitol for the last four years, to come back here with the same number of Representatives that it had when it entered upon this rebellion, without regard to its present population.

Mr. POMEROY. I will say to the gentleman that if, while I have a seat in this body, any Representative should come here from any one of those States, I will endeavor to judicially determine the question whether he has been constitutionally elected, and has the qualifications required by the Constitution. That is all I am called upon to determine. I will not undertake to declare to-day by legislation what a year or two years hence I will judicially determine. Acting in a legislative capacity I cannot bind my own judgment upon this question; much less can I undertake to bind the judgment of anybody else.

What I claim (and it is all that I claim) is that those States have to-day a right to send Representatives here. I should not vote to admit Representatives from those States unless I believed them to represent a loyal sentiment within those States sufficient to preserve their political order. Whenever any man comes here to represent such a political sentiment I will vote for his admission without regard to the manner in which the State constitution under which he comes may have been inaugurated. It is sufficient for me to know that he is a representative of the loyal sentiment of that State, and comes here under a State constitution which is in harmony with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] does not authorize elections to be held. It is a prohibition against elections being held in these States, except three conditions are complied with. It provides that all these conditions shall be complied with before the States shall have the privilege of electing. Not these three conditions only, but each one will be a bar to the election and entrance of members from such States. Neither the people nor the Legislatures of States in insurrection shall elect until, first, the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States within such States has ceased. That is one condition before they can elect. The second is, nor until the people of such State shall have adopted a constitution of government not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Who is to judge of the kind of constitution which the States may adopt? Is it the Congress? The gentleman does not by this bill raise the question as to the character of the constitution. We are not required to vote as to what is or is not repugnant to the Constitution and laws. Is the President the judge as to the quality of the constitution? Not by any special clause of this bill. Is it Congress who is the judge? Congress does not undertake to judge at all until the members are elected. Who then is to judge whether these constitutions are or are not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States? I ask the gentleman to answer me that question.

Mr. WILSON. I will answer the gentleman. The two Houses of Congress constitute the tribunal undoubtedly for determining these questions. They determine whether these conditions exist before these States can engage in the election of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. COX. That will bring it at last, as the gentleman will see, to section five, article one, of the Constitution, the supreme law, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." We need no law. We have the paramount law of the land on the subject. Each House shall judge not only of the election, but the mode, manner, and propriety of it. Each House can by the supreme law of the land determine all of these questions. No law of ours, now and here, can prevent or foreclose these questions. Each House is the tribunal for each case as it arises. When the gentleman makes conditions before the election as to their legality, I think that he only strives to reenact what we have already in a good deal better shape in the Constitution.

My friend from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] suggests to me that by this bill, and by no other bill, can you deprive either House of Congress of the right to pass upon the election, returns, and qualifications of members.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that I admit that. Before either House can pass upon the election there must have been an election. The holding of that election we propose to prevent until certain events.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is not undertaking to facilitate the election of members; not to make an enabling act, but to prevent—for that is his word—the election of members of Congress to represent these insurrectionary States. The bill is a prohibition and not an enabling act. How, then, can he base his bill upon the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution? It says that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." I cannot see that this bill has any foundation in that clause of the Constitution. There is no time fixed in that bill. There is no place fixed in that bill. There is no manner fixed in the bill for holding elections for members of Congress. Congress may make and alter such regulations when the State Legislatures fail to do it. Does the gentleman mean to anticipate or forbid the action of the State Legislatures, or of the people in the respective States? If so, it is a bill to destroy representation, to destroy the States, and destroy the Union. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HIGBY. I shall not pretend to answer the gentleman from Ohio; but what little I have to say will be directed to the theory upon which this bill, or any other bill for reconstruction, is opposed in this House.

Now, sir, I understand that unless we have a law of Congress that will debar any State now in rebellion from coming here with Representatives, that we in this body are obliged, if we will receive any, to receive as many Representatives as were upon this floor at the commencement of this rebellion. I understand we have no power to lessen the number unless there be a law of Congress, passed by both Houses, under which we can act. Sir, the population of those States is being depleted every day. Thousands of refugees are every day coming to the North, and thousands of graves are being filled by those slaughtered upon the field of battle; and in every direction the living are going. The population is wasting away in those States.

And upon this principle, in opposing the passage of the bill of yesterday, or the one of to-day, it is no matter if the population of these States is wasted to one fourth of what it was at the time these seats were vacated. If we have no act of Congress we are obliged to receive as many Representatives as left these Halls at the commencement of this rebellion. We have no safeguard unless we have one in the shape of an act passed by both Houses of Congress. And I put it to gentlemen upon this side of the House who are opposing this amendment, if they are ready to receive the same number of Representatives back into these Halls, without regard to the amount of their population. If they are, it strikes me that they are transferring the battles we are now fighting in the field to the floors of Congress. I choose to fight it out on the battle-field. And I think this is the only way by which we can secure ourselves from any such intrusion here.

Mr. WILSON. I am anxious to get a vote upon this measure to-day, not only for the purpose of disposing of it, but because I have some other reports to submit from the committee, which I probably shall not have another opportunity to do during the session. One of them is a bill upon which gentlemen upon the other side of the House have felt quite as much, if not more, interest than we have on this side. I refer to the bill in relation to the interference with elections by military or naval officers. Therefore I desire to get this bill disposed of in some way.

I do not think the objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] in relation to the action of the President is well founded; for we all know that the inclination of the President's mind has been very liberal in relation to the admission of members from those insurrectionary States. Almost every one who has come here from those so-called reorganized States has, to a greater or less degree, had the favor of the President in relation to his claim to a seat. There can be no danger from that source; and I should apprehend no difficulty whatever in the issuing of the proclamation by the President at any time when a state of things exists in those States as set forth in the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. Does not the gentleman suppose it possible that we may have another President before all the States come back?

Mr. WILSON. I have a faith, strong and abiding, that the ultimate triumph of this nation will be insured long before the termination of the next presidential term. I do not believe that any man on either side of the House doubts an early triumph of the Government over the rebellion.

Mr. MALLORY. The President may die.

Mr. WILSON. That is true; but if that event should occur we would have a faithful Executive in the person of Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, to issue the proclamation upon the happening of the prescribed contingency. I think if the reins of Government should fall into his hands he would not hesitate to issue a proclamation in reference to his own State or any other State when armed resistance to the Government should be subdued.

Mr. MALLORY. This gentleman from Tennessee, of whom the gentleman from Iowa speaks, was the one who proclaimed that no one should be allowed to vote in Tennessee who would not swear that he cordially approved of every proclamation and act of the President of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. That has nothing to do with the actual suppression of armed rebellion; but it suggests to my mind another objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, and that was, that we proposed to interfere with the local affairs of those States, such as marriage, and all civil rights of the citizens thereof. Sir, we propose no such thing. Those are questions which must depend upon the action of the local authorities of the States, and we interfere with them in no manner whatever.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, to which I hope he will give a plain and clear answer. I ask him whether, if members are elected to Congress from these States in defiance of and in spite of this bill, a future Congress cannot admit them anyhow?

Mr. WILSON. Not rightfully, not lawfully.

Mr. COX. Not under the Constitution?

Mr. WILSON. They may override the law; they may disregard the provisions of the statute and by a majority vote admit any person they may see fit to give a seat in this body, but not lawfully.

Mr. COX. Does not the Constitution give us the right to admit any one here?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; it does not give us the right to admit any one here. It gives us the right to admit any person rightfully and lawfully elected.

Mr. COX. Congress is to judge of that.

Mr. WILSON. We are to be the judges of the election.

Mr. COX. That brings the gentleman right round in the circle again.

Mr. WILSON. Not at all. The difficulty which the gentleman labors under is that he confuses the judgment which the House pronounces upon an election which has taken place with the right or the absence of right of the people to hold elections. They must hold elections in accordance with the provisions of law. I desire by this bill to determine when they may hold elections for Senators by these Legislatures, and Representatives by the people. Let this first be done, and then the House can exercise the power to which the gentleman refers and determine whether an election has been held in pursuance of law; that is the sole object we have in pressing this matter.

Now, I think it must have occurred to the mind of every member of this House that the great difficulty we have in dealing with the election cases that are now pending before the House from Louisiana and Arkansas is this: that we are required, because of the manner in which those cases are presented, to pass upon, not merely the election of the members or those claiming seats, but also the condition of the country, the condition of the local governments in those States; we are required to go back and examine all the acts of those people from the time they rebelled against the Government of the United States down to the time they elected or pretended to elect the persons claiming seats here as Representatives from those States. The whole subject is involved in our action upon the cases now pending in the House. The question of election is surrounded and burdened with a multitude of issues which should all be settled in advance of an election.

Now, one object that I have in asking the House to pass this bill is, that we may sever the two questions, that we may decide first in relation to the condition and organization of the State governments, and if we determine that the conditions of the law have been properly complied with, then we have no more to do in passing upon the claims of persons from Louisiana claiming admission here than we have in the cases of claimants from New York or Ohio. The sole consideration then will be whether the election has been legal or whether the parties have been properly elected, all other questions having been disposed of in advance.

Now, sir, in relation to the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POMEROY] that we might, if we pass this bill, interfere with the election of members in the State of New York; that, sir, shows that there is a wide difference between the gentleman's conclusion in relation to the rebellious States and mine. I do not believe that we are called upon to treat the insurrectionary States in the same manner we treat those which have always been true to their allegiance to their Government. To assume such a position is to place the Government in many respects at the mercy of those who are endeavoring to destroy the Republic. I can never yield my assent to such doctrines.

Now, I should like to name some other conditions in this bill, for I am free to say, as one of the members of this House, that I will not vote to recognize a reconstructed government in any State which has been in rebellion against the United States unless that reconstructed government utterly repudiates and forever prohibits the existence of slavery within its jurisdiction. It is not my purpose to recognize or tolerate the existence of a right on the part of the people of any portion of this Republic to make slaves of men. I cannot and will not by any vote of mine favor the continuance of that system of bondage out of which have sprung all of the evils that have been oppressing this nation for the last four years, covering this land with sorrow, and causing mourning in every household. Others may do this if they will, but the crime shall not be found at my door, nor the blood upon my skirts.

Sir, other persons may differ from me in that respect. Other persons may be willing to recognize those reconstructed governments without such a provision being embodied in their constitutions. I therefore make no issue with them on that question, so far as this bill is concerned. I merely say that we will require them to organize a republican form of government, and that the Congress of the United States shall pass on that form of government before the States are permitted to elect Senators and Representatives. If, when I come to exercise my judgment on the constitution which they may adopt and present here, I shall find in it anything that will lead me to the conclusion that it is not a republican form of government, this bill will not prevent me from giving expression to that judgment by a negative vote; nor will it prevent, by any provision in it, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] from passing upon it in such manner as he may deem best, whether it be anti-slavery or pro-slavery.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa, who occupies the position of chairman of the Judiciary Committee in this House, selected for his ability as a lawyer to preside over that law committee, tell me—for I suppose his opinion would have great weight with the community—whether he regards these rebel States as in the Union or out of the Union?

Mr. WILSON. I will answer the gentleman's question with pleasure. I regard this Republic as being possessed of a common domain, consisting of all the territory within the borders of the United States; that that entire domain is subject to the authority of the Government of the United States, and that, so far as the action of the Government of the United States concerns the people, it operates on them as citizens of the United States resident within certain States, but not as the citizens of those States. Yet that portion of the people of the United States residing within the State of South Carolina may, by their own wrong, destroy the local State government which protects them, but the destruction of that local government, which has already taken place by the action of the people of South Carolina, does not release the people of South Carolina, being a portion of the people of the United States, from their obligations to the Government, nor will it relieve them from such measures as the Government may adopt for their punishment for the gigantic crime they have committed against our sovereignty. Neither the people nor territory are out of the Union. They are a part of our people; the territory is a part of our common domain—both subject to our jurisdiction.

• MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate of the United States, by Mr. HICKER, their Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following bills:

An act (S. No. 468) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts respecting copyright," approved February 3, 1831, and to the acts in addition thereto and amendments thereof; and

An act (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which bill and amendments he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to thank the learned gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] for his luminous and intricate answer to my question, and to say that the upshot of it, as I understand, is that the territory of these States is in the Union, but the people all out of it.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; the gentleman will find himself mistaken if the laws of the United States shall be executed on these people as I think they ought to be executed; at least in regard to that portion of them who have misled the masses there into the crime of treason against a Government which never harmed them, but always gave them protection. Every law of the United States is of binding force on all the territory within that southern land, and on all the inhabitants thereof; but the people there have destroyed the machinery of their local government, and we must interfere to reestablish that which they have destroyed, and reassert the authority of the nation, and make it effective for the public good and the general welfare.

Mr. MALLORY. Then, according to the gentleman's theory, they are in the Union for no other purpose than to be hanged.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, they are in the Union for every rightful purpose under the laws of the United States. They have no officers there sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. And the gentleman from Kentucky knows that without that they can have no Governors, no judges, no Legislatures, no officers to execute the law, which we can recognize as being clothed with any authority whatever; and yet he would have us believe that these men, perjured traitors as they are, constitute the State government of South Carolina. No, sir; they are subject to the Constitution of the United States, but they have destroyed their local government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will indulge me in the demand for the previous question. I ask it because I think I have been liberal in the division of my time, and because I desire to submit the other reports to which I have referred.

Upon seconding the demand for the previous question the House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 53.

Mr. WILSON asked for tellers; and tellers were ordered.

Messrs. WILSON and MALLORY were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 69.

So the demand for the previous question was not seconded.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the substitute reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move to amend the substitute by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That in the States declared in rebellion against the United States the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint for each a provisional governor, whose pay and emoluments shall not exceed that of a brigadier general of volunteers, who shall be charged with the civil administration of such State until a State government therein shall be recognized as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the United States shall have recognized a republican form of State government, the provisional governor in each of said States shall see that this act, and the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State for the protection of persons and property in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, are faithfully executed within the State; but no law or usage whereby any person was heretofore held in involuntary servitude shall be recognized or enforced by any court or officer in such State; and the laws for the government, trial, and punishment of white persons shall extend to all persons, and jurors shall have the qualifications of voters under this law for delegates to the convention.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons held to involuntary servitude or labor in the States or parts of States in which such persons have been declared free by any proclamation of the President, are hereby emancipated and discharged therefrom, and they and their posterity shall be forever free. And if any such persons or their posterity shall be restrained of liberty under pretense of any claim to such service or labor, the courts of the United States shall, on habeas corpus, discharge them.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person declared free by this act, or any law of the United States, or any proclamation of the President, be restrained of liberty, with intent to be held in or reduced to involuntary servitude or labor, the person convicted of so restraining him before a court of competent jurisdiction of such act shall be punished by fine of not less than $1,500, and be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the provisional governor shall direct the marshal of the United States, as speedily as may be, to name a sufficient number of deputies, and to enroll all white male citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years resident in the State in their respective counties, and to request each one to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in his enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath, which rolls shall be forthwith returned to the provisional governor; and if the persons taking that oath shall, together with the citizens of the United States from such State in the military or naval service of the United States, amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State, he shall, by proclamation, invite the loyal people of the State thus enrolled and in the military or naval service of the United States to elect delegates to a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the reestablishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the convention in each State shall consist of as many members as both houses of the last constitutional State Legislature. The delegates shall be elected in single districts, and the apportionment shall be made by the provisional governor among the counties, parishes, or districts of the State, in proportion to the number of electors enrolled by the marshal, in compliance with the provisions of this act, including those who are in the military or naval service of the United States, as aforesaid. The provisional governor shall, by proclamation, name a day of election, not less than thirty days thereafter; designate the places of voting in each county, parish, or district, conforming, as nearly as may be convenient, to the places used in the State elections next preceding the rebellion; appoint one or more commissioners to hold the election at each place of voting, and provide an adequate force to keep the peace during the election.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, residents of the State, who are in the military or naval service of the United States, and all who have been honorably discharged therefrom, together with all loyal citizens enrolled as aforesaid, who shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance to the United States, prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862, shall be electors, and may vote for delegates to the convention hereinbefore authorized, in the county, parish, or district in which they reside, and all such citizens of the United States who are in the military or naval service of the United States shall vote at the headquarters of their respective commands, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the provisional governor for the taking and return of their votes; but no person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall vote or be eligible to be elected as delegate at such election.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, or either of them, shall hold the election in conformity with this act, and, so far as may be consistent therewith, shall proceed in the manner used in the State prior to the rebellion. The oath of allegiance shall be taken and subscribed on the poll-book by every voter in the form above prescribed; but every person known by or proved to the commissioners to have held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or to have voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall be excluded though he offer to take the oath; and in case any person who shall have borne arms against the United States shall offer to vote, he shall be deemed to have borne arms voluntarily unless he shall prove the contrary by the testimony of a qualified voter. The poll-book, showing the name and oath of each voter, shall be returned to the provisional governor by the commissioners of election or the one acting, and the provisional governor shall canvass such returns, and declare the person having the highest number of votes elected.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisional governor shall, by proclamation, convene the delegates elected as aforesaid at the capital of the State, on a day not more than three months after the election, giving at least thirty days' notice of such day. In case the said capital shall in his judgment be unfit, he shall in his proclamation appoint another place. He shall call the convention to order, and administer to each delegate, before taking his seat in the convention, the oath of allegiance to the United States in the form hereinbefore prescribed, after which the delegates shall select their own presiding and all other officers of the convention.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say: First. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except civil offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature or Governor. Second. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and freedom and equality of civil rights before the law are guarantied to all persons in said State. Third. No debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, or in any manner in aid thereof, shall be recognized or paid by the State; and all acts, judicial or legislative, for the confiscation or forfeiture of any debt, property, or franchise of any loyal citizen of the United States, are hereby declared null and void.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That when the convention shall have adopted those provisions, it shall proceed to reestablish a republican form of government, and ordain a constitution containing those provisions, which, when adopted, the convention shall by ordinance provide for submitting to the people of the State entitled to vote under this law, at an election to be held in the manner prescribed by the act for the election of delegates, but at a time and place named by the convention, at which election the said electors, and none other, shall vote directly for or against such constitution and form of State government. And the returns of said election shall be made to the provisional governor, who shall canvass the same, and if a majority of the votes cast shall be for the constitution and form of government, he shall certify the same, with a copy thereof, to the President of the United States, who, after obtaining the assent of Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall, by proclamation, recognize the government so established, and none other, as the constitutional government of the State; and from the date of such recognition, and not before, Senators and Representatives and electors for President and Vice President may be elected in such State, according to the laws of the State and of the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That if the convention shall refuse to reestablish the State government on the conditions aforesaid, the provisional governor shall declare it dissolved; but it shall be the duty of the President, whenever he shall have reason to believe that a sufficient number of the people of the State entitled to vote under this act, in number not less than a majority of those enrolled as aforesaid, are willing to reestablish a State government on the conditions aforesaid, to direct the provisional governor to order another election of delegates to a convention for the purpose and in the manner prescribed in this act, and to proceed in all respects as hereinbefore provided, either to dissolve the convention or to certify the State government reestablished by it to the President.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the persons exercising the functions of Governor and Legislature under the rebel usurpation in any State heretofore declared to be in rebellion shall, before armed resistance to the national Government is suppressed in such State, submit to the authority of the United States, and take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and adopt by law the third provision prescribed in the eighth section of this act, and ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States on the 31st day of January, anno Domini 1865, and repeal all ordinances and laws inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to recognize the said Governor and Legislature as the lawful State government of such State; and to certify the fact to Congress for its recognition: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to disturb the boundary lines of any State heretofore recognized by and now represented in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. So far as I can remember, and my memory is pretty good, the amendment just read is identical, verbatim et literatim, with the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] and which was laid on the table yesterday. I now raise the question of order that that bill having been laid on the table it is not in order to offer it now as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there have been several changes made in the bill; one in the fifth section by inserting the word "white" before the words "male citizen;" which is an important change. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to yield for a moment that I may submit an amendment to strike out the word "white" in the fifth section. I will ask him to accept that amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY. Personally I would have no objection to that; but I have been instructed by the committee to insert that word. If I could have a separate vote upon it, which I desire very much, I would vote to strike out the word "white."

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order, for there is already an amendment pending.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I know how anxious the House is to proceed with the important business before the House, and therefore I will detain them but a few moments. I very much desire the adoption of the amendment which I have submitted. Had I consulted my own wishes, I should not have inserted the word "white," which will be found written in the fifth section. I hope to get a vote on the question of striking it out. I intend, however, to vote for the amendment, if it is not stricken out; for, as gentlemen will see, by referring to the seventh section, all colored citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who have been in the military or naval service of the United States, will be authorized to vote at the election for delegates to the State convention, and they alone who vote for delegates to the convention will be authorized to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution which that convention may submit to the people of the State, when that convention shall have been held, and a constitution formed. Thus I secure the right of suffrage to two thirds, if not more, of all the colored men who are in these rebel States, and by the provisions of this bill civil rights will be equally secure to all men.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think it necessary to say whether a colored man ought to vote or ought not. Why not say simply "enroll the citizens of the United States," without saying anything about whether those who have served in the Army or anywhere else shall be allowed to vote? It seems to me that "citizens of the United States" is the true phrase to employ, and I hope the gentleman will agree to that. Let the State itself decide who shall be its citizens.

Mr. ASHLEY. I would gladly accept the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if the matter depended upon my vote. The substitute which I had the honor to submit on yesterday contained the proposition he has suggested, as gentlemen will see by referring to the printed bill. I could not, however, prevent the adoption of the previous question on the bill reported by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and thus have my amendment cut off, unless I consented to insert the word "white." To get my amendment before the House I consented to insert the word "white." I did so, however, with the understanding that I might yield to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] to move to strike the word out, so we might have a direct vote on that proposition.

I want a record made on this question. I do not expect to pass this bill now. At the next session, when a new Congress fresh from the people shall have assembled, with the nation and its Representatives far in advance of the present Congress, I hope to pass even a better bill. Sir, I know that the loyal people of this country will never be guilty of the infamy of inviting the loyal blacks to unite with them in fighting our battles, and after our triumph—a triumph which we never could have achieved but for their generous cooperation and aid—deny these loyal blacks political rights while consenting that pardoned but unrepentant white rebels shall again be clothed with the entire political power of these States.

Failing to secure the adoption of the amendment as printed, I desire as a practical man to secure the next best thing, and that is, the declaration here, on the part of the Congress of the United States, that the people of no rebel State shall hold a convention and frame a constitution which does not contain in it a provision securing the civil rights of these people. And even if the word "white" is not stricken out of the fifth section I secure by the provision of the seventh section to every colored citizen of the United States, who now is or who has been in the military or naval service of the United States, the right to vote first for delegates to a convention, and then upon the constitution which that convention may adopt and submit to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Mr. DAWES. I am very much astonished that my friend from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] should offer this amendment, inserting the word "white" in the manner proposed.

Mr. ASHLEY. I have no doubt that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is very much astonished and shocked; but I would remind him that I have just explained at length the reasons which induced me to offer the substitute with the word "white" to which he objects. I hope when the vote is taken the gentleman from Massachusetts will vote to strike out as I shall.

Mr. COX. My colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] has a great deal of influence in this House; he is the chairman of a committee; and I want to understand from him distinctly his position on this question. I understand that personally he is in favor of the negro, but as a committee man he is in favor of the white man. [Laughter.] Now, I want the gentleman to explain to this House why it is that he will not yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to offer an amendment which conforms to his own political policy. Why is it that he is willing, as he says, if he cannot get the negro, to take the white man as the next best thing? [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY. If the gentleman had been paying attention to the business of the House he would have learned that the Speaker had decided that my friend from Pennsylvania who desired the floor to offer his amendment could not offer it, because there was already pending an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Speaker, my colleague can accept this amendment if he chooses. After the gentleman has made these colored people go into the Army and expose their lives for their country, and after all his professions of regard for them, I ask whether he is willing now to stab them under the fifth rib, and deprive them of the privilege of voting. The gentleman has the matter now in his power.

Mr. ASHLEY. If the gentleman will look at the seventh section, he will see that it secures to every colored man who is now or has been in the military or naval service of the United States the right of suffrage.

Mr. COX. Then what does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want?

Mr. ASHLEY. He wants to make it universal, as I do. If there is to be any limitation of the right of suffrage in the reorganization of the rebel State governments, for one I am determined that it shall not be one of caste, of color, of nationality. If there is to be any restriction let it be one of intelligence, and let no man vote unless he can read in the English language the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I think we all want to go on the record upon all the questions involved here, and I desire that everybody shall be accommodated. Now, as this bill as reported back with amendments is substantially the same as the original bill, though varying in form, I propose that, by common consent, it be treated as the original text. Then the substitute of my friend from Ohio will stand as the first amendment; and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] can move his amendment.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill as amended by the committee will be treated as the original text.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend by striking out the word "white" in the eighth line of the fifth section.

Mr. ASHLEY. I call the previous question upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill, with the pending amendments, be laid on the table.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, withdraw that.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw my motion with the understanding that we shall have a direct vote upon the amendment of my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table; and on that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 65, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Gravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kalfisch, Kanyon, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McKimney, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel L. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—80.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaw, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driess, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClung, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, O'Neill, Orr, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elish B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Woodbridge—65.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Farnsworth, Frank, Hale, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Norton, John O'Neill, Patterson, Robinson, Scott, Spalding, Sweat, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Worthington—37.

So the bill, with the pending amendments, was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ORTH stated that his colleague, Mr. JULIAN, was absent on account of indisposition in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BLAIR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution to amend the naturalization laws, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate joint resolution (No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman believe that Congress has the constitutional power to pass such a law?

Mr. WILSON. I answer the gentleman's question with great pleasure. I have always believed that the Congress of the United States, in time of war, when it was necessary to make our population most effective for the purposes of war, has the power, and has the power to liberate slaves by congressional enactment. That may be, and doubtless is, a doctrine different from that entertained by many gentlemen in this body, but it is not a new one to me. I will not take up time of the House to refer to the opinions of many able and very learned men who have acted, not only in the Halls of Congress, but in other prominent positions in this country, in relation to that question.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate does not differ from him?

Mr. WILSON. I will state that the learned chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee does differ from me; but I am happy to state that he is not the only learned gentleman in that body, and that a majority of the learned gentlemen in that body concur with me, for the Senate passed this bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, with permission of the gentleman from Iowa I will say a few words on this measure before he calls the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident to me that the members of the House on the other side are getting perfectly wild on the subject of the negro.

Mr. WILSON. I think that we are getting our senses.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. They have contracted the disease called "nigger on the brain." [Laughter.] In the space of not more than one hour he has been served up for us in three or four different forms, and in every shape in which he comes he is used for the purpose of disparaging and overthrowing the conceded and established rights of the white man. This measure is presented and is pressed on its passage under a pretended necessity that the country wants the services of the negro as a soldier, and as payment in part for his having become a soldier, or as an inducement for his enlistment as such, and that, too, while you are rejoicing over what you suppose to be the perfect overthrow of those whom you are pleased to call "rebels." I do not believe that it is for the purpose of supplying soldiers to the United States that measures such as this are introduced. I am fully convinced that it is for the purpose, and that only, of interfering with and abolishing the institution called slavery in those States where it is legalized and maintained, and which you are determined to abolish by the most underhand and unconstitutional means, even though the other great reserved rights of the States may be involved in its ruin. Where was the necessity of submitting the question of slavery to the States for their decision under the provision for amending the Constitution, if Congress itself by a majority of its two branches can constitutionally pass a bill to effect the same object?

If you can abolish slavery so far as it relates to the wives and children of negroes who are or are to be your soldiers, why can you not abolish the entire institution by act of Congress? The very fact that you have submitted the question to another tribunal, to three fourths of all the States, under the clause of amendment in the Constitution, shows that you yourselves believe you are violating the provisions of that instrument and its true construction by adopting this measure. You are fearful that that amendment may not be adopted by the States, and you are determined to break through all legal and moral obligations in order to carry out your determination to destroy this institution. I deny your right to touch it in any way with a view to its injury. Your resolution submitting the question of abolishing slavery to the States, which was passed a short time since, and the pretended amendment, when it shall be adopted by three fourths of the States, cannot be made a part of the Constitution which our forefathers have handed down to us for the protection of our rights and liberties, and it will be so decided by any honest judiciary that will ever occupy the bench of the Supreme Court or any other court. The idea that a set of men (and great men, such as the framers of our Constitution were) should allow the unrepeatable privilege to the States to carry on the foreign slave trade itself for twenty years, and to import from Africa an unlimited number of slaves into this country, and at the same time intend that the United States in any way should during the same period or at any time have the constitutional right and power to destroy slavery when they are brought in, is too absurd for belief. It certainly would not have been sensible or honest for them to have given this inducement to their citizens to press all sail so as to obtain all advantages of the slave-trade in the year 1807, and then in 1808 (at which time the privilege of importing slaves ceased) to turn about and abolish all the effect and advantages resulting from that trade. And if not in 1808, why should they intend that the General Government, or the States not interested in the institution, should have that power at any time thereafter? Sir, they never did intend to claim for Congress or for any number of States such a power; on the contrary, the institution was left by them under the exclusive control of the individual States in which it existed.

Sir, that slaves are property in this country is a doctrine that has been recognized by every authority, political and judicial, for centuries. Your highest tribunals have so recognized it, and have declared that it was the duty of Congress to protect this property—not to destroy it. This was the uniform judgment of your courts up to and including the judgment and opinion of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, a case so thoroughly braced by law and reason that I will defy all the ingenuity of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and all the legal aid he can bring from the ranks of his party to state, and especially in regard to the condition of the negro, whether slave or free.

In speaking of this class of our population, this court, in the case referred to, declares:

"The only two provisions in the Constitution which point to them and include them treat them as property, and make it the duty of the Government to protect it. No other power in relation to this race is to be found in the Constitution, and as it is a Government of special delegated powers no authority beyond these two provisions can be constitutionally exercised. The Government of the United States had no right to interfere for any other purpose but that of protecting the rights of the owner, leaving it altogether with the several States to deal with this race, whether emancipated or not, as each State may think justice, humanity and the interests and safety of society require. The States evidently intended to reserve this power exclusively to themselves."

"Exclusively to themselves," is the language of this court.

I have thus cited the decision of the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws (a tribunal which the people of the North have professed to have the highest respect for) to sustain my opposition to the measure now before this House and all kindred measures—a decision not only of the highest judicial authority, in which respect alone I might array it against such propositions as this—but one sustained by a train of argument and reasoning which the successor of our late pure and venerated Chief Justice may be willing but will never be able to refute. What can be your design, then, when you adopt such measures as this, under such circumstances, but to break through all the obligations imposed by our Constitution and to make it a dead letter?

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will not consume too much of my time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I wish only to say further that the whole difficulty of gentlemen on the other side of the House originated in their departure from the fundamental principles of this Government, that each State shall have control of its own institutions, and above all things that the negro, slave or free, should be exclusively under the control of the laws and constitution of the States in which he shall be located. I may add that a greater difficulty, and one which has brought upon us and our country the most dreadful, and I fear lasting calamities, is the entire disregard by the members on the other side, and the party they represent, of that great principle on which our political systems are founded, which is, "that the people have in all cases a right to determine how they will be governed."

Mr. WILSON. I must resume the floor. I did not give way to the gentleman from Maryland to consume all my time, yet I desired to give him a fair opportunity to express his views in regard to this bill. I think the most perfect development of the disease the gentleman referred to that I ever met with may be found in his own person. If he has not the disease which he denominates "nigger on the brain" I do not know that a person can be found who is distressed with it.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined, and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled, "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864;

An act (S. No. 240) for the relief of George A. Schreimer;

An act (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the deaf, the dumb, and the blind," approved February 16, 1857.

ENCOURAGING ENLISTMENTS—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON. We were formerly accustomed to hear such arguments in this Hall, but I am happy to know that the time is rapidly passing away when any man will rise up before the American people, in the Congress of the United States, or elsewhere, and submit such arguments as the gentleman has just drawn from the late Dred Scott decision.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman if he recognizes that as the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILSON. I do not recognize it as a decision in that part of it to which the gentleman has referred, and I never did. The Court as now constituted will never disgrace itself by uttering such an opinion. The time for such things has gone by forever.

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask the gentleman whether that decision has been reversed by the Supreme Court?

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Does not the gentleman consider it as binding law until it is reversed?

Mr. WILSON. Only so far as it related to the single question legitimately before the court, but not in regard to the question to which the gentleman has referred—thence it is a mere dictum.

Now, sir, the gentleman wants to know the purpose of this act. I can tell him. To-day, in the forefront of your Army, are hundreds and thousands of colored men risking everything for the salvation of this Republic. Upon the fields once cursed by slavery, resounding with the clank of the slave's chains and the crack of the overseer's whip, now tread the colored soldiers of the Republic, under the ensign of the nation, striking sturdy blows for freedom and free government.

And, sir, this Republic cannot afford to disgrace itself in the eyes of the civilized world by sending these men out to fight its battles and chaining at home their wives and children in that bondage which is worse than death. It would be a disgrace never to be wiped from the face of this nation if we should permit this wrong to continue beyond the present time, when to us is afforded an opportunity to stop it at once and forever. It is a duty which we owe not only to these men who are fighting our battles, but it is a duty we owe, under the powers which we possess, to the great and eternal principles of God's justice, to see that a full meed of equity and right is meted out to these men who are risking all for our sakes and for the sake of this nation. It is no time to talk about this "property tenure," which, I insist has not been recognized by the Congress of the United States and cannot be recognized by the people of the United States. States have acted on this property basis in regard to these people, but we, acting for the nation, must treat them as persons; they are a part of our population. We are in time of war, with supreme power to deal with the people of this nation in such manner as to render our population most effective in the service of the nation in passing through this great trial of the rebellion.

If, sir, we can strengthen the hearts and arms of these soldiers of the Republic by causing to be conveyed to them the joyous intelligence that their wives and little ones at home are free, and no longer subject to the cruelty of unfeeling masters, we shall not only be doing our duty to them and to our God, but exercising the power resting with us as the Representatives of the people in determining measures to render our population most effective in carrying us successfully through the present trial by battle. We are not bound up by any "property tenure." We do not deal with these people upon any such basis. We deal with them as a part of the people of the United States. We have a right to determine, in providing for the general welfare, whether these people, as a free people, shall aid us in maintaining the sovereignty of the Government or not, and it is upon this broad basis that I place the right and power of Congress to declare that the wives and children of these brave men who are fighting the battles of those who have so long oppressed them, shall be free. On this very day many colored soldiers may be yielding up their lives amid the din and smoke of battle to restore the authority of this nation throughout all its borders. Let us not determine by a refusal to pass this bill that the wives and children shall survive them as slaves.

I do not believe, sir, that it is necessary for me to urge these considerations upon the House. I present this bill as a report from the Judiciary Committee, affording this House an opportunity of doing an act of justice which we have too long withheld. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question to enable me to make a statement.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to reply to all the declamation of the gentleman from Iowa, because I do not think it needs a reply. But I wish to ask the House whether it proposes to pass this measure now. The States are acting on the constitutional amendment proposed by the Congress of the United States. If that amendment shall be ratified, slavery is abolished throughout the United States, swept overboard everywhere, as the gentleman from Iowa will admit. If that amendment be not ratified by the States, the President's proclamation, he contends, frees every slave in the rebel States—and the gentleman addressed his remarks particularly to the slave population in the rebel States. In view of the fact which I have mentioned, why press this measure upon the House? I cannot perceive the necessity or reason for it, even from the gentleman's stand-point.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky cannot see this matter in the light that I do. He has been too long connected with that system of slavery for him to view this question as I do. But the gentleman must know, as we all know, that at the best that constitutional amendment will not be ratified by three fourths of the States for probably two years to come. And, sir, I do not wish, during that time, to have the bondage of these women and children resting upon me. I do not wish to be held, as a Representative of a portion of the American people, responsible for the continuance of this great wrong. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The motion for the previous question takes precedence of that.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 77, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Kaibfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McBride, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Sutes, Srouse, Stuart, Sweet, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Blair, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchinson, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, John O'Neill, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Spalding, Starr, Thomas, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—39.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GOOCH stated that his colleague, Mr. ALLEY, was detained from the House in consequence of the injury which he sustained some days ago.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 63, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—74.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, and Woodbridge—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Blair, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchinson, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Lazear, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, John O'Neill, Patterson, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, Spalding, Starr, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, and Woodbridge—45.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs; that the Senate still insist upon their amendments, which had been disagreed to by the House, and ask for a second committee of conference; and that Messrs. WILSON, HARLAN, and WILLEY, had been appointed for that purpose upon the part of the Senate.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the message from the Senate asking for a second committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House still insist upon its disagreement to the amendments proposed by the Senate, and consent to another committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. BOUTWELL, and Mr. ROLLINS of Missouri, were appointed on the part of the House.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back Senate bill No. 37, entitled "An act to prevent officers of the Army and Navy and other persons engaged in the military or naval service of the United States from interfering in elections in the States," with the recommendation that the bill be passed.

The bill was read at length, for information.

Mr. WILSON. I call the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read a third time.

Mr. WILSON demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN moved to lay the bill on the table.

Upon that motion the House divided; and there were—yeas 16, nays 96.

Mr. SLOAN called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded; and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN called for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 18, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, City, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Daves, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Prunty, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—113.

NAVS—Messrs. Ashley, Beaman, Boyd, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Garfield, Kelley, Knox, John H. Rice, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Upson, Wilder, and Worthington—18.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cresswell, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Farnsworth, Frank, Harrington, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lazar, Loan, Marcy, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Morrill, Norton, John O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scheuck, Scott, Spalding, Starr, Thomas, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—51.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ECKLEY said: My colleague, Mr. SPALDING, is detained from his seat to-day by indisposition.

The result of the vote was announced as above.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that unanimous consent be given to take from the Speaker's table Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 640) entitled "An act to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes." I desire that we may non-concur in a portion of those amendments, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that the proposition will be extended, and that the House will consent to take all the Senate bills from the Speaker's table and refer them.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Judiciary are entitled to the floor until they complete their business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would suggest that that be done by general consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking from the Speaker's table Senate amendments to House bill No. 640?

There was no objection.

The first amendment of the Senate was to strike out in the fifth line of the fourth section the words "which are possessed by them" and insert in lieu thereof the words "which are vested in said court and said judge."

The amendment was concurred in.

The second amendment of the Senate was to strike out sections six, seven, eight, and nine, and insert a substitute.

Mr. TODD. I desire to move an amendment providing that the salaries of the judges in the Territories of Colorado and Dakota shall be increased to $2,500.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that that amendment with regard to a territorial court would not be in order, as this bill relates to district and circuit courts in the State of Nevada.

Mr. WILSON. I call the previous question. Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House concur.

Mr. WILSON. The provisions inserted by the Senate are in the nature of a substitute for the House bill. To the first amendment, in which the House has just concurred, the Committee on the Judiciary have no objections; but the portion of the bill which the Senate has stricken out embraces provisions relating to the clerks in Oregon and California, which, we think, if preserved in the form in which they were passed by the House, would save to the Government $6,000 a year. We therefore desire a committee of conference, in order that, if possible, the matter may be arranged, and that we may save that amount to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman explain how that amount is to be saved?

Mr. WILSON. The bill as passed by the House provided that the clerk of the circuit court should act as clerk of the district court, and applied to him the same limitations that apply to all other clerks. His salary is limited to $6,000. If there were two clerks, the pay of the two would be $12,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House bill gave him double the usual fees, while the Senate bill gives him the usual fees.

Mr. WILSON. It limits the amount to $6,000. Although the fees may be doubled, as is the case in California, yet they cannot in the aggregate get more than $6,000. The two clerks, under the law as it now stands, can receive $6,000 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my motion to concur.

The amendments were non-concurred in, and a conference was asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 80, to divide the State of Pennsylvania into three judicial districts, and to establish a district court to be holden in the city of Erie, with a substitute.

The substitute was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this simply increase the terms of the courts?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It authorizes the same court to hold one more term. There is no increase of pay.

The substitute was adopted. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN NEW-YORK.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to take up and concur in the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 184, to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 579, providing for the forfeiture of the fee of rebel landholders; and demanded the previous question on its passage.

It provides that so much of a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, &c., approved July 17, 1862, as prohibits the forfeiture of the real estate of rebels beyond their natural lives be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. WORTHINGTON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. Has not this bill been disposed of during the present Congress?

The SPEAKER. This bill certainly has not.

Mr. NOBLE. I rise to a question of order. The same provision has passed in the freedmen's bill.

The SPEAKER. It was incidental to that bill, and does not preclude this committee, which has had the subject solely under consideration, from reporting on it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON renewed it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to rescind, for this day only, the order of the House fixing the adjournment at half-past five o'clock, p. m.

Mr. SMITH demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at quarter-past five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of professors of mathematics in the Navy, praying to be placed on an equality with surgeons of the Navy in regard to pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 445) making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a ship-canal to connect Lake Superior with Portage lake in the upper peninsula of said State, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred a petition of chaplains in the Navy, praying to be allowed the pay of line officers with whom they rank, and a petition of chaplains in the Navy, praying for an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from their further consideration.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to purchase pouches or boxes of Marshall Smith's patent for the postal service, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Manitowoc river, in that State, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 457) to change the name of the propeller F. W. Backus to Metacomet, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 435) to amend an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred messages of the President of the United States relating to international exhibitions to be held in Bergen, in Norway, and Oporto, in Portugal, during the coming summer, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 122) relating to international exhibitions at Bergen, in Norway, and Oporto, in Portugal, during the summer of 1865; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SUMNER asked for its present consideration, but Mr. TRUMBULL objecting, the resolution was laid over under the rules.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) defining the meaning of the law in regard to officers' servants, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 360) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported it with an amendment; and he asked for its present consideration, but Mr. SUMNER objecting, it was laid over.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print one thousand additional copies of the report of the Joint Committee on the Library in regard to the burning of the Smithsonian Institution, five hundred of which to be for the use of the Institution, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Public

Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendments, and that they ought not to pass:

A bill (S. No. 229) to grant aid for the construction of certain railroads in the State of Minnesota;

A bill (S. No. 369) for the relief of the occupants of the lands of the mission of San José, in the State of California; and

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; another bill on the same subject having been reported.

Mr. FOOT, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration:

A bill (S. No. 263) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 431) to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State;"

A bill (S. No. 433) to extend the homestead act of May 20, 1862, to settlers on land reserved for railroad purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 436) making a grant of lands to the Territories of Dakota, Montana, and Idaho, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territories, to connect with the railroad system of Minnesota and Iowa.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a resolution of the Senate instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the bill granting swamp and overflowed lands to certain States to overflowed lands in the State of Kansas; a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the chairman of the committee on Public Lands, recommending selections of the public lands on the Pacific slope to be reserved for the use of the Government; resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Elwood, in that State, to the Big Bend of the Republican river; resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of the construction of a bridge across the Republican river on the Government reservation at Fort Riley; resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lac La Belle to the Cliff mine, thence along the mineral range to some point on the Montreal river, in that State; resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of an extension of the time for the completion of the Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad; resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the location of the North Sioux city branch of the Pacific railroad westwardly along the parallel of forty-two and one half degrees of north latitude to a point of junction with the main track of said road; a petition of settlers in Alameda county, California, remonstrating against a grant of the lands on which they have their homes to the claimants of the pretended San José mission, or to parties claiming by purchase under them; petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lac La Belle to the Cliff mine, thence to some point on the Montreal river, in that State; and the memorial of Rudolph Wicczorek, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws, report in favor of concurring in the second amendment and against concurring in the first, third, fourth, and fifth amendments. I ask for action on the report at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hardly suppose gentlemen wish to have a statement of the merits of each amendment; the number of the amendments we propose to concur in and of those we propose to non-concur in has been stated; that is enough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the amendments will be dispensed with by unanimous consent; the Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the report, which is that the Senate concur in the second House amendment and non-concur in the others.

The report was agreed to.

POST OFFICE CLERKSHIPS.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 389) in relation to clerkships in the Post Office Department, report that the Senate concur in the second and non-concur in the first amendment.

The reading of the amendments was dispensed with, and the report was agreed to.

AMERICAN REGISTERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and as it will take but a moment to pass it I ask unanimous consent to put it on its passage now.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British-built schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter, they being now owned by a citizen of Buffalo, New York.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOTS IN STOCKBRIDGE, WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 558. It is one of considerable importance both to the Government and a portion of our State. My time is almost continually occupied upon the Committee on Finance, and I hope the Senate will indulge me to this extent now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (H. R. No. 558) to authorize the issuing of patents for certain lands in the town of Stockbridge, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Public Lands had reported the bill with amendments, the first of which was to strike out the first and second sections of the bill, in the following words:

That, upon satisfactory proof being made that any occupants of land in the town of Stockbridge, Calumet county, in the State of Wisconsin, which has, by treaty or otherwise, been allotted to any individual members of the Stockbridge or Munsee tribe of Indians, are the purchasers, grantees, or assignees of such members of said tribes, the President of the United States be authorized to issue patents for the land so occupied to such purchasers, grantees, or assignees, respectively: Provided, That in case of conflicting claims to any of the lots of land the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to hear the proofs of the respective claimants, and to decide which of such claimants are justly entitled to said land, and patents shall be issued in accordance with such decision.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That patents issued according to this act shall vest in the patentee title to the land described in such patent, in fee simple, subject to any valid lien or incumbrance thereon created by said patentee or those under whom he claims.

Mr. HOWE. Before the question is taken on striking out I believe it will be in order to move an amendment to one of the sections proposed to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the first section by inserting the word "unpatented" before "land" in the fourth line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Now I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment proposed by the committee. Since that report was made I have had a conversation with the chairman, [Mr. HARLAN,] and I think he is now satisfied that the amendment ought not to be made. The amendment which has been adopted at my instance was suggested to me by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Commissioner is entirely satisfied with the bill as now amended, and so I believe is the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HARLAN. As now informed, I do not think the Committee on Public Lands would insist on striking out the sections as amended.

The amendment of the committee was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out at the end of the bill the words "the residue of said lands shall be brought into market and sold as other Government lands," and in lieu of them to insert "the lands not sold within one year as hereinbefore provided, shall be brought into market and sold at not less than the minimum prices fixed by this act;" so as to make the third section read:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lots of land in said town of Stockbridge belonging to the United States, not hereinbefore directed to be patented, shall be attached to and form a part of the Menasha land district, and if in the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it shall be for the public interest, the same may be sold at the minimum price of three dollars per acre for lots fronting on Lake Winnebago, five dollars per acre for the two tiers of lots fronting on the military road, one tier of lots on each side thereof, and $2 50 per acre for the residue of said land to actual settlers thereon possessing the qualifications requisite to acquire preemption rights, who shall prove to the satisfaction of the register of the land office at Menasha, Wisconsin, that he or she has made improvements to the value of not less than fifty dollars, and is actually residing upon the land; the time of paying the purchase price may be extended for a period not exceeding one year from the passage of this act: Provided, That no such actual settler shall be permitted to pre-empt more than two contiguous lots on which he or she has made improvements of the value of not less than $100. The lands not sold within one year, as hereinbefore provided, shall be brought into market and sold at not less than the minimum prices fixed by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to make an inquiry of my colleague and my friend from Iowa, whether under the provisions of the bill any member of this Stockbridge tribe can have the privilege of entering this land and purchasing it, the same as other citizens. If not, I should like to have a provision inserted to that effect.

Mr. HARLAN. There is nothing in the bill forbidding it, though an amendment expressly including them could do no harm. These are lands that have been exposed to sale at a price above that of the public lands in the market generally, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office has no authority, under the law as it now stands, to reoffer them. This bill is intended to remedy that evil and place the minimum below that sum, if in the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office the public interests shall require it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 471) to incorporate the National Mississippi Bridge Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 472) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the bill (S. No. 414) to authorize the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad eastward to Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan, and provide for its connection eastward with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian system of railroads, at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. HARLAN. It will not be necessary, I think, to read the bill, as it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; that committee having reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to dispensing with the reading of the original bill, and the substitute only will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed by the Committee on Public Lands to be inserted in lieu of the original bill, as follows:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the terminus of the lines of the Grand Rapids and Indiana, and the Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay railroads, at the point of junction at or near Traverse Bay, in the State of Michigan, as provided by existing laws of the United States, to the straits of Mackinaw, and from the straits of Mackinaw to Little Bay de Noquet, and to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon, in the said State, to the western boundary thereof, every alternate section or parts thereof of public lands not mineral, designated by odd numbers, not reserved, appropriated, or otherwise disposed of, and to which a preemption claim or homestead settlement has not attached, to the amount of ten sections per mile for each mile of railroad, to be located as near as practicable to the line of said railroads throughout their whole extent: Provided, That the land so granted shall in no case be located more than twenty miles from the lines of said road: Provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose, whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excepted from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: Provided further, That any lands which may have been granted to the State of Michigan for the purpose of aiding in the construction of any railroad, which lands may be located within the limits of this grant, shall be deducted from the full quantity of lands hereby granted, and that any lands which may have been so granted shall be strictly applied in accordance with the terms and conditions in said act or acts.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land, which by this grant shall remain to the United States, within ten miles on each side of said roads, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price as aforesaid: Provided, That actual bona fide settlers under the preemption laws of the United States may, after due proof of settlement, improvement, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price: And provided also, That settlers under the provisions of the homestead law, who comply with the terms and requirements of said act, shall be entitled to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, for the purposes aforesaid, and no other. And the said railroads shall be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States free of all toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be disposed of by said State for the purposes aforesaid only, and in manner following, namely: when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner as a first-class railroad, and the said Secretary shall be satisfied that said State has complied in good faith with this requirement, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and selected as aforesaid, situated opposite to and within a limit of ten miles of the line of said section of road thus completed, extending along the whole length of said completed section of ten miles of road, and no further. And when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary shall be satisfied that another section of said road, ten consecutive miles in extent, connecting with the preceding section or with some other first-class railroad which may be at the time in successful operation, is completed as aforesaid, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and situated opposite to and within the limit of ten miles of the line of said completed section of road or roads, and extending the length of said section, and no further, and so, from time to time, until said roads are completed. And when the Governor of said State shall so certify, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied, that the whole of said roads is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents to all the remaining lands granted for the purposes indicated in this act, situated within the said limits of twenty miles from the line thereof, throughout the entire length of said road: Provided, That no land shall be granted and conveyed to said State under the provisions of this act on account of the construction of any railroad or part thereof that has been or may hereafter be constructed under the provisions of any other act, and adopted as a part of the line of railroad provided for in this act: And provided further, That said lands shall not in any manner be disposed of or incumbered, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete said road within ten years after the acceptance of this grant, then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the Governor of the said State of Michigan shall file, or cause to be filed, with the Secretary of the Interior maps designating the routes of said road, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from market the lands embraced within the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported on said road, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law provide: Provided, That, until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General shall have power to fix the rate of compensation.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the time for the completion of each and all of the railroads named in the act approved June 3, 1855, entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, extended eight years.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in section seven, line six, after the word "purposes," the words "and an act amendatory thereof, approved June 7, 1864;" and after the word "years," at the close of the section, to insert "from the day of the approval of this act." These amendments are agreed to by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read, "A bill making a grant of lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of railroads in that State."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, insisted upon by the Senate; that it agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK, of Ohio, Mr. G. S. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, and Mr. JAMES S. ROLLINS, of Missouri, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 80) directing a district or circuit court to be held at the city of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania.

A bill (H. R. No. 609) to prescribe the mode of designating citizens of the United States who shall serve as jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 638) to facilitate judicial proceedings on writs of error and appeals;

A bill (H. R. No. 707) to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 758) amendatory of the acts relative to the Attorney General's office, and to fix the compensation of his assistant and clerks;

A bill (H. R. No. 775) for the relief of the occupants of the ex-mission of San José, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 777) changing the name of Emil Cohen;

A bill (H. R. No. 778) in relation to the appropriation of private property to the public use;

A bill (H. R. No. 779) to regulate the taking of depositions in certain cases; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) relating to the account of B. C. Whiting.

COMMITTEE ON CURRENCY.

Mr. FOOT. I submit a resolution proposing to amend the rules:

Resolved, That the 34th rule of the Senate be amended by inserting after the words "a Committee on Finance, to consist of seven members," the following: "a Committee on Currency and Banking, to consist of seven members."

Of course this resolution cannot be considered unless by unanimous consent, but if no objection be made, it may as well be adopted now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it go over.

Mr. FOOT. Very well.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution recognizing the existing State government in Louisiana.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that subject should be considered.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken on this motion, I wish the Senate to understand that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] is engaged in a speech which was cut off by the adjournment last night on the bill known as the railroad bill. I presume the Senator from Illinois would not push the matter that he has in charge so far as to prevent the Senator from Nevada from finishing his speech. He has the floor, in the natural course of business, at one o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be soon enough to decide that question when the time comes. It is not one o'clock now; he has not the floor now.

Mr. SUMNER. He has not the floor now; but I presume the Senator is serious when he proposes to take up a measure of this importance, and expects to proceed with it. I merely wish that the Senate should see what is before them, that at one o'clock, according to the natural course of business, we shall have the pleasure of listening to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it very unjust to the public business of this country that from day to day these questions of courtesy should be forced in here to the detriment of the public service. Yesterday, because the Senator from Nevada was in the midst of a speech, the Senate gave way with its other business that he might go on. Is that to be repeated from day to day? I do not know that the Senator from Nevada is complaining. When he appeals to the courtesy of the Senate and wishes to proceed with his speech, I shall certainly be disposed to extend to him all the courtesy that the Senate is in the habit of extending to any of its members; but it will be for him and not the Senator from Massachusetts, I suppose, to complain if he is not treated with proper courtesy by the body. I hope we may proceed with the consideration of this question; it is an important one; it ought to be settled, and it ought to be settled now. The gentlemen claiming seats from the State of Louisiana are entitled to have it settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that motion will not prevail. The Senator from Illinois has had this Louisiana case before his committee week after week and month after month. If it was a matter of so much importance as he represents I should suppose he would have reported it at a proper time, when we could have had proper discussion and proper action. Now to bring it up, eight days from the close of the session, to interfere with important business, I will not say reprehensible or outrageous, but it is at least crowding the good nature of this body.

Mr. HARLAN. I deem it my duty to state my objection to taking up the measure named by the Senator from Illinois. The Committee on Public Lands have had before them the subject of the disposition of the private land claims in California for some two months, have labored carefully on the subject, and have finally reported a bill which they think will simplify the disposition of those lands greatly, and believe that action on that subject is necessary at the present session of Congress. As that bill originates in the Senate and must necessarily be considered by the House of Representatives before it can become a law it is important that it be acted on soon. I have been deferring the subject from time to time through feelings of courtesy to other members, and I feel now like raising the question if the Senator from Illinois shall insist on his motion. I do not believe that the bill to which I allude will occupy more than five or ten minutes, but it is a bill of vast consequence. There is one claim alone pending in which the value of the property amounts, it is said, to more than half a million dollars, and it is believed by the Committee that this bill will dispose satisfactorily of the whole subject; and if this motion of the Senator from Illinois shall be voted down I shall then try to get the bill up. I shall therefore have to vote against his motion; though I would vote to give that joint resolution the preference of the pending order.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg leave to say that the bill to which the honorable Senator from Iowa alludes will not pass in ten minutes unless the Senate could at some time pass it without hearing the voice of California in the premises, for it is the opinion of this part of the California delegation that no more mischievous bill could possibly be passed for our State than the bill spoken of so highly and recommended by the honorable Senator from Iowa. When a question of so much importance as the one proposed is to be discussed, I apprehend the Senate of the United States will hear us very fully before it is disposed of. I say this much to give notice that no bill of that kind can pass this body, unless the Senate imposes it upon us, until it has been very thoroughly and fully discussed. Of course I will not occupy the time of the Senate now by entering upon any discussion of it. It is not before us. I find myself very unpleasantly situated in having to say this of the bill spoken of by the honorable Senator from Iowa, and at the same time being opposed to the motion pending, which proposes to launch us into the consideration of whether we shall not only receive Senators from a new State, but whether we shall admit a State into the Union at this point of time. I am totally and entirely against the consideration of the proposition now presented by the honorable Senator from Illinois, but will not vote when his motion shall be voted down, if it shall be, to take up the bill proposed by the honorable Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nevada if he is prepared to proceed with his speech at this time.

Mr. NYE. I shall only occupy a few minutes.

Mr. GRIMES. That will control my vote against the motion proposed by the Senator from Illinois. As soon as the Senator from Nevada shall have concluded his speech I will vote with the Senator from Illinois if he makes the motion to take up his joint resolution.

Mr. FOOT. So will I.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to my friend from Illinois whether this resolution cannot be taken up and then informally laid aside until the Senator from Nevada finishes his speech.

Mr. WILSON. Let him conclude and then this can be taken up.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is immaterial to me which way it is done; but after the Senator from Nevada shall have finished his speech I am with the Senator from Illinois for taking up the resolution in regard to Louisiana.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Nevada insists on the floor to go on with his speech, I withdraw my motion and he may go on at once, as far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the motion cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to offer a resolution—

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to make a remark on the motion of the Senator from Illinois before it is withdrawn.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator is too late.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has been withdrawn, and is not now before the Senate.

ORDERS OF GENERAL BANKS.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate General Order No. 23 issued by Major General Banks at New Orleans, and dated February 3, 1864.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask the Senator if he is sure of the number of the order. Is it not No. 34?

Mr. POWELL. I am sure of the number. I wish to have this order, to be used in the discussion of this very Louisiana case.

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the matter, it is the military order by which this State government has been constituted.

Mr. POWELL. It is one of the orders connected with it. There are several orders, and this is one.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. WILSON moved that the Senate take a recess at half past four o'clock until seven o'clock, p. m.; and the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolution and bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) relating to the account of B. C. Whiting;

A bill (H. R. No. 80) directing a district or circuit court to be held at the city of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 779) to regulate the taking of depositions in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 778) in relation to the appropriation of private property to the public use;

A bill (H. R. No. 777) changing the name of Emil Cohen;

A bill (H. R. No. 758) amendatory of the acts relative to the Attorney General's office, and to fix the compensation of his assistant and clerks;

A bill (H. R. No. 797) to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 609) to prescribe the mode of designating citizens of the United States who shall serve as jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 638) to facilitate judicial proceedings on writs of error and appeals.

The bill (H. R. No. 775) for the relief of the occupants of the lands of the ex-mission of San José, in the State of California, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to lay that bill on the table.

Mr. HARLAN. I object to that motion. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table takes precedence of the motion to commit.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a vote on my motion, and I desire to say—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a House bill, and is it proposed to lay it on the table without consideration?

Mr. CONNESS. A similar bill has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and that committee during the whole session has not reported it until this morning, when the committee made an adverse report. I do not desire the same identical bill sent to the committee, because it is of no use; we now have the report of the committee on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States; upon which the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NYE addressed the Senate, continuing and concluding the speech which he commenced yesterday. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MORRILL obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maine is not anxious to proceed with his remarks now, I hope he will allow the joint resolution in relation to Louisiana to be taken up.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no special preference on the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maine does not insist on going on at this time, as I understand he does not, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution for the recognition of the existing State government in Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that motion will not prevail, and if the Senator from Maine does not desire to speak I hope we shall have a vote immediately on this bill. I gave notice that I should antagonize it against any measure before this body except the regular financial and appropriation bills. The bill has now been thoroughly discussed, and we are prepared for a vote, and we can get a vote to-day if the Senate will stand by me; and certainly we never shall get a vote until after the 4th of March upon the Louisiana case. I am surprised that the Senator from Illinois should propose to bring up that case at this late day of the session. I hope the Senate will stand by me in regard to the pending bill, and if the Senator from Maine desires to make a speech upon it he will be listened to, and I shall ask for a session to-night if we do not get through with it before that time, for the purpose of disposing of the bill. I hope the Senate will not adopt the motion of the Senator from Illinois, but will permit the Senator from Maine to go on with his speech if he desires to do so.

Mr. SUMNER. I certainly agree with the Senator from Michigan, and I must remark again, as I have repeatedly, that I think it is a bad economy of the time of the Senate to go on a little way with one measure and then abandon it and take up another. Let us finish the pending measure. There are two ways of killing a measure; one is by voting it down, the other is by postponing it until you lose an opportunity of voting upon it, and the latter is the policy of certain Senators with regard to the railroad measure. I think that the friends of that measure ought not to be insensible to that policy; they ought to be prepared against it; and they should insist that the measure be proceeded with until they have a vote. If the Senator from Maine is not disposed to go on now, there are other Senators, doubtless, who are; at any rate we can vote, and let the question be taken from our Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe I expressed no wish on the subject. I yielded to the inquiry put to me by the Senator from Illinois. I am entirely indifferent on the question. Before the bill is acted on by the Senate I desire to be heard.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say in regard to the bill now before the Senate, that believing as I do in the doctrine of State rights I can never vote for it; but circumstances are such that before gentlemen vote I should like to have them state their opinion whether these strong State monopolies have got such influence that they can come in the presence of the Senate of the United States and seek to control the legislation of the country. I will not vote for this bill under any circumstances, and yet I would just as lief see it passed as not. I want to know whether there is any political intrigue, whether the Democratic party of this country is sold by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company or not. I should like some of my Republican friends—perhaps the class-leader of the party, the Senator from New Hampshire is just as capable of giving an opinion as anybody else. I mean no reflection on him, for I regard him as a personal friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on postponing the pending bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to call the attention of the country to this question. With my ideas of State rights I would not vote for such a bill under any circumstances, but I do not want these State monopolies to come into the Senate of the United States and undertake to control the legislation of the country; and I am apprehensive that they are here with their lobby agents. I want now to advertise the country that if I am not present on the vote—and if I were outside I would not enter the room to vote on the question—the reason of it is because I believe there is corruption foul and damnable in the whole thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution resolution relative to the State government of Louisiana.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I wish to say a word in regard to this question. It is one of very great importance to the country. It is known that there is an organization in the State of Louisiana claiming to be loyal to the United States, and to act in obedience to the laws and the Constitution of the United States. It is known that the inhabitants of that State have been declared to be in a state of rebellion. It is known that this organization has elected Representatives and Senators to the Congress of the United States. It is known that those persons are here claiming seats, and it is of vital importance, as I think, to the well-being of this country that we should determine it one way or the other. This is not the time to argue how we should determine it; but it is important that we should settle for the inhabitants of Louisiana who are loyal to this Government, and who have undertaken to set up a State government in conformity to the Constitution, whether their government is to be recognized or not. The Senate ought to consider it. The question partakes of the character of a question of privilege, because upon the recognition of this existing government in Louisiana depends the right of the persons elected by the Legislature there to seats in this body, and I cannot see how Senators can refuse to consider a question of this kind.

The question now is, will you consider it? not how you will decide it. We are within a few days of the close of the session. I have struggled before to-day to get up this resolution. If it is to be postponed to other bills and we are not to determine who is to constitute the Senate of the United States, it seems to me we are pursuing a very improper and unparliamentary course. The first thing to be done is to determine, as soon as it can be intelligently determined, who are the proper persons to constitute the body. If these gentlemen claiming seats here are proper Senators, they have a right to be here and to vote on this very question. If they are not properly elected, let the inhabitants of Louisiana know that the organization that they have attempted is not a proper one, and let them take the necessary steps to get up a proper organization that we can recognize. I trust that the Senate will vote to consider the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. All that is known about the State of Louisiana has been long known. For months and months this knowledge has been before the Senate and before the country, and yet until the last forty-eight hours no motion even has been made to bring the question before the Senate. If we take up that subject the discussion will continue until the 4th of March, and we shall not have a vote upon it if we do take it up. The bill now under consideration has been before this body for two long years. It has been put off by divers and sundry subterfuges from day to day and from month to month and from year to year. It has now been thoroughly discussed. There are but one or two more speeches to be made on the subject. I believe if we now adhere to the bill we can get a vote to-day, and we can settle this question forever. I hope the Senate will stand by the bill until the vote is taken. I have no speech to make upon it, not a single word to say upon it. All I ask is a vote on the bill, and I hope the Senate will stand by the bill until the vote is taken. If it is voted down, let it be voted down; but if the Senate believe the bill ought to be passed, let it pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the proposition of the Senator from Illinois is to devote the balance of this session to the consideration of that particular question. Is there any Senator here who supposes that that question of the readmission of the rebellious States into the Union, if that be a proper expression, or the restoration of their rights in this body, can be disposed of short of a very lengthy discussion? It may not be desirable that it shall be postponed, but it is the misfortune of the case. The subject is brought up here just at the heel of the session. I think there are many measures that do deserve the attention of Congress before the adjournment. This proposition is tantamount to saying that nothing else shall be considered.

One word more, sir. I do not expect to discuss the merits of the bill which the Senator from Michigan has in charge. To some extent I sympathize with the sentiments of the Senator from Delaware. I do not like to be found on the side of a monopoly, and I do not like much to interfere with the laws of the States. But this is certain, as I believe from my observation of the business of the Senate, that to get along with business, when a bill is taken up it ought to be disposed of. If this measure is right it ought to be voted upon and adopted; if it is wrong it ought to be voted down. I do not favor this system of defeating a measure by merely pushing it off. I think that the success of business in this body requires that when a measure is once taken up it be disposed of.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I think that the most important question is the one submitted by the Senator from Illinois. I believe the State of New Jersey is yet in the Union. Although it has been a subject of a great deal of pastime and pleasure about her being out of the Union, still I believe, in fact, she is in the Union. How long she may remain there I am unable to say.

Mr. SUMNER. I am sorry it is doubtful.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The Senator from Massachusetts says it is a doubtful subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I said, "I am sorry it is doubtful."

Mr. TEN EYCK. Sir, I am sorry that a constitutional question like the one involved is regarded as doubtful.

The State of New Jersey then being still in the Union at the present time in fact, I think it a matter of vast importance that we should consider whether the State of Louisiana should be entitled to be considered as in this Union, and to have her representation on this floor, especially after she has gone through the trials of this rebellion, especially after she has put treason under her feet, especially as she has sent her representatives here who have been standing with their heels out in the cold at the door of this body, and is desirous to aid and assist in the entire and complete restoration of this Union and the power of this Government over the length and breadth of this land. Why, sir, we have sacrificed in vain tens of thousands of the lives of our purest, noblest, and best, and we have expended thousands of millions of money for the accomplishment of a purpose which now appears to be upon the very eve of accomplishment if after all this Senate persists not only in refusing to hear the application of Louisiana, but in slapping her in the face. I know of no question so important as the recognition of the rights of these States which have been trampled upon, after having been brought into the vortex of the rebellion, and who, when they now seek to come back and be allowed to resume their places in the Union in the only way in which they can come, are to be met with the plea that a discussion will spring up upon the subject, and that it will last until after the 4th day of March, when no decision can be had. I do not think that that will be the result of taking up the joint resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee in relation to Louisiana. I hope it will not be the result.

Much as I wish that the question in relation to the New Jersey railroads now agitating the people of this country, and especially the people of New Jersey, a question which is irritating and grinding and worrying the masses of her people, may be disposed of, notwithstanding my anxiety that that question may be settled, I desire that a question which is of infinitely more importance may at least have the preference upon this floor. I believe that both these measures can be considered and acted upon before the adjournment of the present Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair must state that upon a motion of this character extended discussion is not in order; nor is any discussion in regard to the merits of the bill in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the bill relating to New Jersey will be acted upon and disposed of before we proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee. That bill has been long under discussion, and it is one of great importance; and, certainly, I feel that we shall be but doing our duty to proceed and dispose of that measure either the one way or the other, and get it out of the way. We shall then know what we are about, and what is before us.

I do not consider that the other measure, relating to the State of Louisiana, is of such transcendent importance as seems to have been ascribed to it by the honorable Senator from New Jersey. What is this State as to which he declares that all her rights have been trampled upon, and are still trampled upon; or at all events neglected and disregarded? The very document before us, furnished from the Committee on the Judiciary, shows that this so-called State of Louisiana comprises only a little more than eight thousand legal voters who participated in the adoption of the constitution either pro or con., together with the usual proportion of females. Out of a voting population in 1860, as reported by the census of that year, of more than fifty thousand in the State of Louisiana, the present number of voters in that State claiming to exercise the rights and to be represented by Senators here and by Representatives in the other House, is but eight thousand, and those eight thousand are to-day, as is well enough known, protected in the enjoyment of such rights as they possess, not by the laws of Louisiana, not by the will of the people of Louisiana, but by the bayonets of your armies who are now within the limits of that State, and but for which Louisiana would to-day be, to all intents and purposes, a rebel State, and actually in the possession of the rebel authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator—

Mr. HOWARD. I beg pardon of the Senate for going into the merits of the question at all. I simply make these observations in reply to the few remarks which fell from my honorable friend from New Jersey on this subject. I do not think the country is likely to suffer much from a suspension of our action on this Louisiana matter.

Mr. SUMNER. There was a remark that fell from the Senator from Illinois to which I wish to reply. He urged the importance of the measure which he had in charge. Sir, in reply to him I urge the importance of the measure which he proposes to displace; and the importance of the latter measure is decided by the fact that it has already occupied the attention of the other House, and that we are now considering a bill from that House and not a resolution first reported by a committee of this body. The proposition now moved by the Senator from Illinois makes its appearance here for the first time at the close of this session. It did not appear here during the last session. The other measure has the advantage of it in every respect. I submit there can be no comparison in the intrinsic importance of the two measures. The one proposes to overthrow an odious monopoly, and to declare an important principle of constitutional law; the other is simply an attempt on the part of the Senator to open a dance which is to last through the remainder of this session. That is all, sir. I doubt if the Senator himself seriously imagines that his measure can pass in any practical form. It is merely a dance of debate that he wishes to inaugurate in this Chamber. Sir, I think that the Senate had better proceed with the practical measures before it, those to which it has already given attention, and in which the country is really interested.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to suppose that the only object of getting up the bill for the recognition of the existing State governments is to inaugurate "a dance of debate;" and then he goes on to tell us that the matter that is to be displaced by it has already passed the House of Representatives, has been under discussion for twelve months and longer. They have been dancing in this debate for twelve months, and the Senator wants to pursue it. I think if there was nothing else involved in this matter but simply this "dance of debate," it would be well to have a new figure after dancing twelve months to this old one.

This is not the proper time to speak of the merits of this measure; to speak of the merit of the bill which the Senator from Michigan has in charge, or of the merit of the joint resolution I desire to call up; but it is proper to speak of the importance of that resolution. Sir, it relates to the restoration of this Union. It relates to the establishment of commercial relations with a State the inhabitants of which have been in rebellion against the Government. "It relates to the opening of the great Mississippi river to the commerce of the country. It relates to peace, which we all desire upon honorable terms at the first practicable moment. At some time these revolted States are to be brought into harmony with the Government of the United States. At some time the authority of the Constitution and laws of the country is to be recognized throughout Louisiana, and all these States, I trust. Here is an effort of eight thousand persons, says the Senator from Michigan, and the testimony of sworn witnesses says of more than half the loyal voting population of Louisiana, asking that their government may be restored to the authority of the United States, asking that they may set up a government in harmony with ours, asking that they may establish local laws and freedom, which I know the Senator from Massachusetts loves, throughout Louisiana; and the Senator from Massachusetts will not hear them. If a single negro is expelled from the cars in the District of Columbia, the voice of the Senator from Massachusetts is heard in this Hall; he will repeal charters and take up the time of Congress about the rights of the negro, but when more than ten thousand voters, representing hundreds of thousands of loyal Union men, ask the protection of your laws and the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution, the Senator from Massachusetts says they shall not be heard, because some proposition is here, a new proposition, brought into the Senate for the first time since the foundation of the Government, by which the Congress of the United States propose to take charge of the roads and highways of the United States! That is such a pressing measure that you cannot attend to one affecting the vital interests of the country, the restoration of peace and the establishment of the authority of the Government throughout one of the States which has heretofore been in rebellion. Sir, if there is any question of transcendent importance which this Congress can consider, it is that which relates to the bringing into harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States the population of those districts of country which have been in rebellion against the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts gives far less importance to this question than it is entitled to. In addition to all the strong reasons given by the Senator from Illinois there is, in my judgment, a very powerful one which should press for its consideration now at this session, and it should be disposed of at the present session.

Mr. President, you know with what anxiety and what earnestness members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives, as well as a large majority of the American people, have urged the adoption of an amendment of the Constitution of the United States which was to settle forever this vexed question of slavery. We know that if the people of Louisiana have a right to organize their State government, as we insist they have, it is of almost vital importance that that State should be recognized in some form in such manner as to allow the people of that State and the Legislature of that State to vote upon the great question, I will say the paramount question, now submitted to the American people, whether that constitutional amendment shall or shall not be adopted. Upon that subject, in the minds of nine tenths of all the people of this country, the conviction is clear that the votes of twenty-seven States are necessary to the ratification or the adoption of that amendment to the Constitution. The vote of Louisiana, therefore, becomes necessary. My honorable friend from Massachusetts shakes his head and says substantially no.

Mr. SUMNER. I say no.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that the honorable Senator has a resolution before the Senate of the United States in which he proposes to declare as the sense of Congress that three fourths of the States of this Union, in voting upon the constitutional amendment, are only intended to include three fourths of those States in which the insurrection has not existed.

Mr. SUMNER. Three fourths of the de facto States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Three fourths of the States that are represented in Congress substantially. I do not question the sincerity of my honorable friend in his opinion. I have never done so. Much as I have differed with him on many questions, I have never doubted his sincerity. I have sometimes thought that in the earnestness with which he advocates his views he sees very clearly what makes for him, and does not see quite so clearly what makes against him; yet I have never questioned his sincerity in the opinions that he advocates. But although he may be sincere, I venture to say that nine tenths, if not ninety nine out of every hundred, of the people of the United States and the legal profession will maintain that "three fourths of the States" means three fourths of all the States of the United States which are necessary to the adoption of a constitutional amendment. Whether it be necessary or not, it is necessary to have them to put the question beyond doubt; and therefore I maintain that in this present exigency there is not and cannot possibly be a more important question presented to Congress than this very one, whether Louisiana is to be recognized as a State, with power to vote on this question, in addition to all the other strong reasons that are given why this subject should be acted upon. Sir, is there any greater measure to be presented to Congress than a question whether a State shall be represented on this floor? I say it is not only an important question, but it is a question of paramount importance, a privileged question, which takes precedence of other questions, the question of the admission of a member of this body.

Now, sir, what is this other question which is insisted upon and is presented to the Senate as of such transcendent importance. It is a question between two railroad companies in the State of New Jersey, involving the other question, whether the Congress of the United States shall now assume to do what it never has assumed to do in the whole history of the Government, annul the provisions of the charter of a company which has been incorporated under the laws of a State. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of that question on its merits at the present time; but the importance of this question in relation to Louisiana cannot be overstated, in my opinion.

Mr. SUMNER. I hoped not to say another word in this discussion, but a remark that fell from the Senator from Wisconsin does tempt me again into debate. Sir, I cannot conceal my astonishment at the Senator from Wisconsin. The Congress of the United States has already proposed an amendment to the Constitution to secure liberty throughout all the land, and to make the words of the prophecy a reality, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." The Senator from Wisconsin who voted for that proposition now comes forward swiftly in order to seek to impose upon the country his own interpretation of the Constitution so as to prevent that from becoming a practical reality.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not like to interrupt the honorable Senator; but, sir, for ten days I have been trying to call up a measure of the greatest consequence to the people I represent, and here, on a motion having for its object the mere precedence of business, not only the question in the Louisiana matter is discussed, but the question of the resolutions formerly introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do hope that we shall get to some subject so that I may get to the legislative business with which I am charged at some time.

Mr. SUMNER. Well, Mr. President, I will not say anything more on the point except to protest, in the name of liberty and in the name of the Constitution, against any such interpretation as the Senator from Wisconsin now seeks to impose.

Mr. DAVIS. I call the Senator to order. I protest against his making any protest in the name of or for the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator may make his protest and I shall continue to make mine. I do protest, in the name of liberty and in the name of the Constitution, against any such suggestion as the Senator from Wisconsin has chosen to throw out now in order to arrest the great march of human freedom. Sir, that constitutional amendment will become a part of our fundamental law when it has been approved and ratified by nineteen States of this Union. I submit that question to the judicial and juridical talent of the land. I do not doubt the result. I know already the opinions of learned lawyers and judges on the question. I am not alone. If the Senator again sets himself up on the side of slavery, and by his interpretations seeks to arrest the great march of human freedom, he will find himself in the minority.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has several times remarked that no extended debate can be indulged in on a motion such as is now before the Senate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When the Senator refers to me personally in these terms, I think I ought to be permitted to reply. The honorable Senator says that when I again set myself up as the great defender of the institution of slavery I ought not to be listened to either by the Senate or the country. Is it forgotten to this Senate how that Senator struggled against the passage of this constitutional amendment? There is no member of this body that does not remember with what pertinacity, in season and out of season, he struggled against it, denouncing it in advance as a useless undertaking, when I was urging it as the great measure of peace on this question of slavery; that it was necessary to have the constitutional amendment to give efficacy to presidential proclamations; to put this question of freedom where it could not be disturbed by a change of parties or a change of Presidents, or a change of the decisions of the Supreme Court. Sir, I arraign that Senator, boastful as he is of being the friend of freedom—

Mr. CHANDLER. I call the Senator to order.
Mr. DOOLITTLE. I submit that I am not out of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. The whole debate is out of order, and I call the Senator to order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to finish my sentence, and the Senator from Michigan will understand whether I am out of order or not. Instead of my standing in the march of freedom and in favor of the building up of slavery, I say that Senator, by struggling against the admission of the free State of Louisiana now, which by its constitution has knocked off the shackles of ninety thousand slaves that the emancipation proclamation did not reach, stands in the way of freedom, and is throwing the weight of the influence of his great name in favor of holding those men still in the condition in which they were left by the emancipation proclamation, which excepted them and left them slaves in Louisiana. Talk to me of standing in the march of freedom under circumstances like these! I am for the constitutional amendment which sets free every slave; not merely the wife or the children of the soldiers in our armies, but all their cousins and all their relatives and all their neighbors. I am for a measure which is to be effective, and which is not open to discussion even in Congress or in the courts; a measure which overrides Congress and the courts and Presidents and parties, and puts this question of freedom forever at rest, where it never can be disturbed in this country. I arraign him for opposing now the admission of a free State whose voice may be necessary to the consummation of this great measure.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must again remind the Senate that this protracted discussion cannot be in order. Any personal explanations may be made.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to set my friend from Wisconsin right on one point. I do not believe he intended to do injustice. He has strangely miscollected the facts. I have before me a joint resolution submitted by myself, February 8, 1864, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I am not aware that at that time the Senator had made any particular expression of opinion on the subject. The amendment that I proposed was in these words:

"Everywhere within the limits of the United States, and of each State and Territory thereof, all persons are equal before the law, so that no person can hold another as a slave."

That resolution I maintained, in season and out of season, always. The Senator has no authority for saying that I ever in any respect questioned or opposed the constitutional amendment. I gave it my most ardent support. At the same time I did support all measures against slavery. I sought by those measures to girdle the tree, while at the same time by the ax I sought to fell the tree to the ground. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I correct him in point of fact.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will refer to the Senator's speeches and give him his language on some other occasion. I remember his speeches very well.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin urges as a reason for taking up the joint resolution, which it is proposed now to consider, that it is necessary that the State of Louisiana should be readmitted into the Union in order to secure the ratification of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery. I do not consider that there is much weight in this reason. Let us look very briefly at the facts as they exist at present; for I will not consume the time of the Senate unnecessarily. The number of loyal States now in the Union and acknowledging the authority of the United States without the interposition of military power is twenty-four, and in this number are included the States of Kentucky, New Jersey, and Delaware. This number of twenty-four also includes the very recent State of Nevada. The number of disloyal States which have been all along and are still covered by the President's proclamation, as being in a state of insurrection, is eleven. The whole number of States—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HOWARD. Not unless he calls me to order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do; I call the Senator to order; he is not discussing the question of the order of business.

Mr. HOWARD. I demand that the words may be taken down in writing, so that the point may be in writing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The point of order is that the Senator's remarks are irrelevant to the question under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated at various times that no discussion of the merits of the measure was in order; but great indulgence has been extended to allow personal explanations. The Chair hopes that the Senator will confine himself entirely to the question.

Mr. HOWARD. Why did not my friend from Illinois interrupt the honorable Senator from Wisconsin when he was indulging in this same line of remark? Why does he visit me with his call to order?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that I thought the discussion some time ago was out of order, and was in hopes that it would cease; but I give notice now that I will call the Senator from Wisconsin or anybody else to order when I think he is trespassing or out of order.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the honorable Senator from Illinois also urged that as a reason for taking up this joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No.

Mr. HOWARD. I may be mistaken as to that. At all events he considered that the question was one of great importance. Its importance consists in that, and very little else, if it has any importance. Now, sir, I want to show that it is not of so much importance. We have thirty-six States, including the loyal and the disloyal States. Upon the hypothesis that it will require three-fourths of all these States, loyal and disloyal, to ratify the amendment to the Constitution, it will be necessary that it should be ratified by at least twenty-seven States. I do not here state my opinion as to the correctness of that hypothesis, but I know that hypothesis is entertained by many gentlemen in this Chamber. According to it, there must be a ratification by twenty-seven States. Suppose we deduct from the twenty-four loyal States the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Kentucky. That will leave only twenty-one which at present can be relied upon to ratify this amendment to the Constitution. What sort of use then will it be at present to introduce Louisiana? It will only increase the number of certain States to twenty-two, and that will be just five short of the necessary three-fourths. Why, therefore, press this matter upon us? I have no more to say on the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hathan, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Farwell, Foot, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Cowan, Harding, Henderson, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Salsbury, Sherman, and Wilson—13.

So the motion was agreed to.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to propound a question to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. Why is it that he reports a joint resolution for Louisiana, excluding Arkansas which stands in the same position?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that it was thought more advisable by the Committee on the Judiciary to act upon the State of Louisiana separately. The facts are not precisely the same in Louisiana and in Arkansas, though the principle may be very similar, and it was thought that it would, perhaps, complicate the matter to put the two together. The principle upon which the committee have reported this joint resolution, if adopted by the Senate, would be made applicable of course to any other State. This had been referred separately to the committee, and it was thought best to act upon one case first.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the chairman will permit me, I think he will remember that the Arkansas case was not before the committee at the time we were hearing this case, and hence the resolution is limited to the Louisiana case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was not before us when the Louisiana case was first considered, but it came before us before it was finally disposed of.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Do the committee expect to report the Arkansas case during the present session?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is the intention of the committee to act immediately upon the Arkansas case when this is disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That neither the people nor the Legislature of any State, the people of which were declared to be in insurrection against the United States by the proclamation of the President, dated August 16, 1861, shall hereafter elect Representatives or Senators to the Congress of the United States until the President, by proclamation, shall have declared that armed hostility to the Government of the United States within such State has ceased; nor until the people of such State shall have adopted a constitution of government not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States; nor until, by a law of Congress, such State shall have been declared to be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States of America.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely wish to say that I trust the amendment will not be adopted. Although the general features of the amendment would not be unacceptable to me in most of its features, still I think it better not to adopt it with reference to the State of Louisiana at this time. It would not operate upon this particular case, because it is prospective. Another objection to it is, if I heard it read correctly, that it would put it in the power of the President to keep out a State forever by refusing to issue his proclamation. I do not believe in placing any such power in the hands of the President. When Congress think proper to admit the Senators and Representatives from a State I think they should be permitted to do so; and to say that no representation shall be had until the President issues a certain proclamation is what I am not willing to say.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Grimes, Howard, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Wade—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Hathan, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wiley, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Davis, Foot, Harding, Henderson, Howe, McDougall, Salsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to make some remarks upon this subject, but I am not prepared to do so to-day. The Senate this morning passed a resolution requesting the President to transmit to us a certain order issued by General Banks, which is a very important document to have in the discussion. If no other Senator wishes to address the Senate on the subject, I move that the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, by which time we shall probably receive that order, and I shall then be prepared to address the Senate, very briefly however, on this subject. I do not suppose I shall occupy more than a few minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I dislike very much to have this matter go over, but I certainly will not be discourteous to the Senator from Kentucky. I think the Senator from Kentucky is apprised of the contents of the order about which he wishes to comment; that the substance of it is embraced in a report already submitted to the House of Representatives. I do not know whether he will be able to get an answer to his resolution by to-morrow, and I think it very questionable whether the order to which he alludes is in the possession of the President. I submit to him whether he cannot proceed to-day. If the resolution goes over, and we wait for the answer to this inquiry, it may be postponed for a number of days.

Mr. POWELL. I cannot proceed to-day for another reason: I did not expect this measure would be called up to-day, and all my papers on the subject are in my room. I will inform the Senator, however, that I do not ask for a postponement longer than to-morrow morning. If the President does not send an answer to the resolution of the Senate by that time, I shall then be ready to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. According to the uniform practice of the Senate, if the Senator from Kentucky insists upon the resolution going over, and no other Senator is prepared to make any remarks upon the question, I cannot resist it, and it will have to go over, I suppose. If it does, I think we had better make it the special order at one o'clock, so as to dispose of it to-morrow. With that understanding, I shall not resist the motion, if the Senator will move to make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. POWELL. I am perfectly willing to do that. I was in hopes that some other Senator desired to discuss it to-day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope if any other Senator wishes to speak that we will go on with the discussion to-day.

Mr. POWELL. If any other Senator wishes to speak to-day I will withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw the motion?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say that it is my intention to address the Senate upon this joint resolution, but I am not prepared to proceed to-day. I hope, therefore, that the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I renew it, so that we may get to other business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be made the special order at one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir. I move that the further consideration of the joint resolution be postponed to, and made the special order for, to-morrow, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes; and

A bill (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 579) to repeal a portion of a joint resolution "explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM HIGBY, of California, Mr. H. C. WORTHINGTON, of Nevada, and Mr. F. KERNAN, of New York, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. FOSTER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. FOSTER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. JOHNSON.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 775) for the relief of the occupants of the lands of the ex-mission of San José, in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

PROSECUTIONS FOR LIBEL IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are several bills, some of them of considerable importance, which have been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, that will not take up time, and I will ask the Senate to consider them. That committee has taken up very little of the time of the Senate at this session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia, reported by the committee unanimously, and which will take no time, I think.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that in all prosecutions or indictments for libel instituted, or which may hereafter be instituted, in the District of Columbia, the truth thereof may be given in evidence under the general issue as a justification of the alleged libel; and if it appear that the matter charged as libelous was true, and was written or published with good motives, and for justifiable ends, the defendant shall be acquitted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit courts in the district of Virginia. It provides that the circuit courts in the districts of Virginia, heretofore holden at Richmond, shall be held at Norfolk on the first Monday in May and on the fourth Monday in November in each year; and all proceedings and process in or issuing out of the court which are or may be made returnable to any other times or places appointed for holding the same than those above specified are to be deemed legally returnable on the days and at the place above specified, and not otherwise; and all suits and other proceedings in the court which stand continued to any other time or place than those above specified are to be deemed continued to the place and time prescribed by this act, and no other.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February 21, 1863.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 667) to provide for two assistant local inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and for two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to reestablish the board of local inspectors at Wheeling; and also to amend the act approved June 8, 1864, entitled "An act to create an additional inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection districts of Memphis and Oregon, and for other purposes;"

A bill (H. R. No. 697) further to provide for the verification of invoices;

A bill (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;

A bill (H. R. No. 764) to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of the city of Washington;

A bill (H. R. No. 780) to extend the provisions of the first section of "An act for the government of persons in certain fisheries," approved June 19, 1813; and

A bill (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor.

BUST OF CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move now to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 748.

Mr. SUMNER. What is that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. A bill providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney, to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to that; that now an emancipated country should make a bust to the author of the Dred Scott decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The question before the Senate is on taking up the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the bill will be taken up; that a person who has presided over the Supreme Court of the United States for more than a quarter of a century, and has added reputation to the character of the judiciary of the United States throughout the world is not to be hooted down by an exclamation that the country is to be emancipated. Suppose he did make a wrong decision. No man is infallible. He was a great and learned and an able man. I trust the Senate will take up the bill, and not only take it up, but pass it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois says that this idea of a bust is not to be hooted down. Let me tell that Senator that the name of Taney is to be hooted down the page of history.

Judgment is beginning now; and an emancipated country will fasten upon him the stigma which he deserves. The Senator says that he for twenty-five years administered justice. He administered justice at last wickedly, and degraded the judiciary of the country, and degraded the age.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot fail to express my astonishment at the course of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, which he thinks it, I suppose, his duty to pursue. Sir, if the times in which we are living are honestly and truly recorded by the historian, I think the honorable member from Massachusetts will be very happy if he stands as pure and as high upon the historic page as the learned judge who is now no more.

The honorable member seems to suppose that the decision in the Dred Scott case was a decision of the Chief Justice alone. It was not so. In that decision a majority of the court concurred. Whether that decision is right or not, permit me to say to the honorable member there are men belonging to the profession at least his equals, who think it to have been right; but whether right or wrong, those who knew the moral character of the Chief Justice as well as I did would blush to say that his name is to be execrated among men. Sir, the decisions of that learned jurist are now quoted with approbation everywhere, and there is not a judge upon the bench now, three or four of them having been selected by the present incumbent of the presidential office, who will not say at once that a brighter intellect never adorned the judicial station. But it is a matter of history. Every judge who has been at the head of that tribunal has his bust placed in that court-room. Does the honorable member wish to have it unknown in future times that there was such a Chief Justice? I suppose he does; I presume he does; and why? Because he differed with him. If so, to be consistent, he will be compelled to wish that two thirds of the profession in the United States, and two thirds of the country, should be forgotten in all after time, for I am sure I am not mistaken in supposing that at least that number will be found in opposition to the peculiar opinions of the honorable member from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must insist that upon a motion to take up, the merits of the bill cannot be considered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg pardon. It was only because the honorable member thought proper, and I take it for granted he considered it a matter of duty, to assail the memory of a departed, and a great, and a virtuous man, that I deemed it my duty to rise up and say a word in his vindication.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must repeat to Senators that this discussion is out of order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. McDUGALL. For the same reason that these remarks have been permitted I may be allowed to express a sentiment at least in response to the rude, the very rude, remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts; and I will express my sentiment in a brief form of words. When the judge of whom he has spoken so rudely stood in his own place the Senator was not more worthy than this, to stand at the door of his chamber.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 748) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States. It requires the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Congress on the Library to contract with a suitable artist for the execution, in marble, and delivery in the Supreme Court Room of the United States in the Capitol, of a bust of the late Chief Justice Roger B. Taney; and appropriates the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for this purpose.

Mr. SUMNER. I objected to this joint resolution some days ago, when it was reported by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and he was disposed to hurry it at once upon the Senate, to the exclusion of important business. I objected to it again to-day, but it was from no indisposition to discuss it.

I know well the trivial apology which may be made for this proposition, and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has already shown something of the hardihood with which it may be defended. But in the performance of public duty I am indifferent to both.

The apology is too obvious. "Nothing but good of the dead." This is a familiar saying, which, to a certain extent, may be acknowledged. But it is entirely inapplicable when statues and busts are proposed in honor of the dead. Then, at least, truth must prevail.

If a man has done evil during life he must not be complimented in marble. And if indiscreetly it is proposed to decree such a signal honor, then the evil he has done must be exposed; nor shall any false delicacy seal my lips. It is not enough that he held high place, that he enjoyed worldly honors, or was endowed with intellectual gifts.

"Who wickedly is wise, or madly brave,
Is but the more a fool, the more a knave."

What is the office of Chief Justice, if it has been used to betray Human Rights? The crime is great according to the position of the criminal.

If you were asked, sir, to mention the incident of our history previous to the rebellion which was in all respects most worthy of condemnation, most calculated to cause the blush of shame, and most deadly in its consequences, I do not doubt that you would say the Dred Scott decision, and especially the wicked opinion of the Chief Justice on that occasion. I say this with pain. I do not seek this debate. But when a proposition is made to honor the author of this wickedness with a commemorative bust, at the expense of the country, I am obliged to speak plainly.

I am not aware that the English judges who decided contrary to Liberty in the case of ship-money, and thus sustained the king in those pretensions which ended in civil war, have ever been commemorated in marble. I am not aware that Jeffreys, Chief Justice and Chancellor of England, famous for his talents as for his crimes, has found any niche in Westminster Hall. No, sir. They have been left to the judgment of history, and there I insist that Taney shall be left in sympathetic companionship. Each was the tool of unjust power. But the Power which Taney served was none other than that Slave Power which has involved the country in war.

I speak what cannot be denied when I declare that the opinion of the Chief Justice in the case of Dred Scott was more thoroughly abominable than anything of the kind in the history of courts. Judicial baseness reached its lowest point on that occasion. You have not forgotten that terrible decision where a most unrighteous judgment was sustained by a falsification of history. Of course the Constitution of the United States and every principle of Liberty was falsified, but historical truth was falsified also. I have here the authentic report of the case, from which it appears that the Chief Justice, while enforcing his unjust conclusion which was to blast a whole race, used the following language:

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken.

"They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect, and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit."—19 Howard's Reports, 407.

In these words, solemnly and authoritatively uttered by the Chief Justice of the United States, humanity and truth were set at naught, and the whole country was humbled. "Then you and I and all of us fell down while bloody slavery flourished over us."

I quote his words fully so that there can be no mistake. Here then is his expressed assertion, that at the Declaration of Independence in 1776, and the adoption of the national Constitution in 1789, in Europe as well as in our own country, "colored men had no rights which white men were bound to respect." Now, sir, this is false—arociously false. It is notorious that there were States of the Union where, at the adoption of the Constitution, colored persons were free, and even in the enjoyment of the electoral franchise, while in England the Somerset case had already decided that there could be no distinction of persons on account of color, and Scotland, Holland, and France had all declared the same rule. On this point there can be no question. And yet this Chief Justice, whom you propose to honor with a marble bust, had the unblushing effrontery to declare that at that time, as well abroad as at home, "colored men had no rights which white men were bound to respect;" and this he said in order to justify a wicked interpretation of the Constitution. Search the judicial annals and you will find no perversion of truth more flagrant.

Sir, it is not fit, it is not decent, that such a person should be commemorated by a vote of Congress; especially at this time when liberty is at last recognized. If you have money to appropriate in this way, let it be in honor of the defenders of liberty now gathered to their fathers. There was John Quincy Adams. There also was Joshua R. Giddings. Let their busts be placed in the court-room, if you please, where with marble lips they can plead always for human rights and teach judge and advocate the glory and the beauty of justice. Then will you do something not entirely unworthy of a regenerated land; something which will be an example for future times; something which will help to fix the standard of history.

I know that in the court-room there are busts of the other Chief Justices. Very well. So in the hall of the dogs, at Venice, there are pictures of all who filled that high office in unbroken succession, with the exception of Marino Faliero, who, although as venerable from years as Taney, was deemed unworthy of a place in that line. Where his picture should have been there was a vacant space which testified always to the justice of the republic. Let such a vacant space in our court-room testify to the justice of our Republic. Let it speak in warning to all who would betray liberty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no amendment be proposed, the resolution will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to strike out the name of "Roger B. Taney" and insert "Joshua R. Giddings," and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it would be just as appropriate to put in the name of "Joshua R. Giddings, a justice of the Supreme Court" into this resolution, as is the Senator's speech, following to his grave and denouncing a man who has stood high, certainly, as an able jurist, for a quarter of a century and more in this country. The Senator talks about honoring Roger B. Taney. Sir, Roger B. Taney has passed beyond your assaults or your honors. He has gone where the feelings of hate and animosity or love and affection can reach him no more; and I for one am not for undertaking to follow a departed brother into that other world for the purpose of denouncing him. I agree that the decision in the Dred Scott case was wrong. I always thought so. The Senator has read from it, and he says that the late Chief Justice made a mistake as to the truth of history, that he made a statement in regard to the condition of the negro at the time of the Declaration of Independence which was not true. Suppose he did; what has that to do with the question of preserving in the Supreme Court of the United States busts of the Chief Justices of that court? Every man who has presided over that eminent tribunal from the foundation of the Government has had his bust preserved in marble. It is proposed to continue that custom. Chief Justice Taney presided there for a long time; Marshall himself did not sit there much longer. I will not undertake to institute a comparison between Marshall and Taney. They were great men, both of them, great jurists, and each has shed luster upon the judicial tribunal over which he presided. Each was a man of great ability, of great learning, of great purity of character, and I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts should come in with this denunciation of a man against whom he can find no fault except that he made an erroneous decision. If the Senator from Massachusetts had presided, or should ever preside over the Supreme Court of the United States for thirty years, he would be more than man if he did not make any erroneous decision.

I do not desire to take up time on this question. We wish to do for Chief Justice Taney what we have done for the other judges who presided over that court, and we have done it in every instance, and the insertion of the name of Mr. Giddings as now proposed is so inappropriate, so out of place, that I cannot suppose it will receive any support.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw the amendment, and am willing to come to a direct vote.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not propose to indulge in any denunciation against Chief Justice Taney, or say anything that I think any of his friends have a right to be offended at. But, sir, the placing of a marble bust of any man in any public place by the act of the Government is an indication that the Government highly esteems and regards his memory and his character and his example, and that they will cherish his fame and take this mode of perpetuating his name and memory in enduring marble. If it has not that meaning it has no meaning at all. I apprehend Congress would not be willing to pass a general act that whoever has heretofore been, or shall hereafter be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, should have a marble bust placed up in the court-room. If that was the character of the act, it would have no value at all. But when the Congress of the United States direct that a marble bust of a certain individual shall be preserved in a public place it is an indication to the world, to the present time, and to coming ages, that the Congress and the people of the United States deem him to have been worthy of such distinguished honor.

Sir, all that has been said about the ability of Chief Justice Taney may be true. I confess that while he was upon the bench, a portion of the time, to say the least, I was in the practice of the law, and had occasion to know something about him; and I began to feel, yes, sir, I began to hope that before he went off the stage of action he would do something to redeem his memory from the opprobrium and the odium under which it rested, in my humble judgment, for the manner that he came on the bench. Unfortunately for the Supreme Court of the United States, it has not been the fashion to appoint men there because they are lawyers, but rather because they are not lawyers, and in some cases because they not only are not lawyers but in all human probability never can be lawyers. That is what gets men on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States; and if you get one that is a lawyer, it is a mere accident.

I remember discussing in this body the question of confirming a man to a seat on that bench, and the discussion was not whether he was a lawyer but whether he entertained sound views on the question of the negro; and we had the assurance of Mr. Benjamin, of Louisiana, and others of that ilk and school, that upon this transcendent question the candidate was sound. The Senate did not go any further than that; they confirmed him, and confirmed him for that reason; and I suppose if it should so happen in the course of nature or politics that that individual should be made Chief Justice we should have to put up a marble bust of him because the precedents are that way.

I am opposed to this being done in this particular instance, because whatever Judge Taney may have been—he may have been as good a judge as the Senator from Maryland thinks him to have been, or as my friend from Illinois thinks.—he will be known to posterity outside of the legal profession, he will be known to the world, by the Dred Scott decision. That will associate itself with his memory, and his memory will associate itself with that. There have been very distinguished judges in England, and some of them are distinguished and their memory is cherished and held in reverence by posterity at the present time in connection with some great judgment that they gave illustrative of some great principle; and in future ages, when the history of this time and of the controversy in which we are now engaged, and through which we have gone, shall go down to posterity, Judge Taney and the Dred Scott decision will go together; the name of Dred Scott will bring up Roger B. Taney, and the name of Roger B. Taney will bring up Dred Scott. There they are for evil or for good, and thus associated they will live through all coming time as long as the history of this country and the history of the great trial through which it has passed is remembered and preserved, and it is for this decision and by this decision that Judge Taney becomes eminent.

Entertaining that opinion and believing beyond controversy that to be the fact, I am not willing to pass an appropriation to do honor to the Dred Scott decision or to its author. Mr. President, I have been compelled sometimes to say some unpleasant things about the Supreme Court, things that I wish I could not have been compelled to say, and now I will tell you another fact about this Dred Scott decision; and bad as I think of the decision itself, I do not think so bad of it as I do of the fact which I am going to read, and read from the official report. I may do injustice to these men's motives, but I hope not. I want it now understood, if there is any friend of the court here, that I am speaking of the court as an abstraction, not of its members. The report of the case says that it "was argued at the December term, 1855, and ordered to be reargued at the present term," that is, December, 1856. That is the fact to which I allude, and which I am going to illustrate and explain a little. In December, 1855, the awakened public sentiment of this country was arrested and drawn to the very alarming encroachments which the slave power was making in its mad efforts to extend itself into the Territories of the United States, to usurp exclusive control over those Territories for the uses and purposes of perpetuating and extending slavery. That sentiment had made such great progress in the public mind that it developed itself in the organization of a party which nominated soon after a candidate for the Presidency, John C. Frémont. These things were as well known and foreshadowed in 1855 as they have been known to history since. The Supreme Court of the United States was at that time the thrall of slavery, just as much so as Gurth, the son of Beowulf, and Wamboa, son of Witless, that had a ring about their necks by which they were marked "born thrall of Cedric, of Rotherwood." The Supreme Court, the thrall of slavery, did not think it prudent to publish the decision which they made at December term, 1855, and for what reason? There was a presidential election coming on in the fall of 1856; and if the decision had been made at the sitting of 1855, and the public had known it; if the decision which was afterward proclaimed in 1857 had been declared in 1855 or the early part of 1856 the sage of Wheatland would now be an ex-Senator instead of an ex-President. The Supreme Court kept back the decision. The matter was fully argued at the term of 1855. There was no question about complexion that might not as well have been decided then as after, but after it was argued in 1855 they dared not, in the interest of the Democratic party, proclaim the decision, and they resorted to this dodge:

"It was now argued by Mr. Blair and Mr. G. F. Curtis"—

By the way, I want to do justice to the name of Mr. Curtis, and call on all the world to notice that the reporter has not got his name right; it is G. T. Curtis, not G. F.—

"for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Geyer and Mr. Johnson for the defendant in error."

Notwithstanding the luminous arguments that were submitted to the court at the December term of 1855 the court were not ready to make a decision; they virtually said "Put the decision off till after the election, which comes on before the next term of the court; then the Democratic party will have the benefit of our decision, and escape the odium of it." That is the way that I read the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, because I believe that men do not act without a motive, and there is no other possible motive to be assigned.

They put it off, they held this decision in suspense, and I remember that the gentlemen who were associated together at that time in the Free Soil or Republican party, whenever they undertook to intimate that such a decision as was afterward made would be rendered, were met with indignant denial and remonstrance, and it was said the court would never decide anything of that sort. Things went on, the election of 1856 occurred, Mr. Buchanan was elected, and then the Supreme Court did not want any more light on the subject; then they decided just exactly as they did decide, and just exactly as they would not decide if they had to decide it now.

I believe that this decision is discreditable to Judge Taney; I do not say it is disgraceful. I believe it is discreditable to him. I believe it was a reproach to the civilization and the humanity of the age, and if I may be permitted to say it without the imputation of arrogance—and I will say it if I am submitted to that imputation—I believe it was not only a reproach to the civilization and humanity of the age, but was a perfect parody on the Constitution, and anybody who will read the dissenting opinions of Judge Curtis and Judge McLean, it seems to me, cannot help coming to that conclusion.

Now, sir, I think the most that can reasonably be asked of those who entertain views such as I do, and I do not know that anybody else does, is that we let Judge Taney alone, let his memory alone, let his fame go for what it is worth, and let impartial posterity, which does not fail as a general fact to do justice to the character and the motives of men, be left to do that justice to Judge Taney; but do not let us in our mistaken kindness for the memory of the dead or the feelings of the living—do not, in Heaven's name, let any friends of right, of justice, of liberty, and of downtrodden humanity, give the lie to what they have said again and again upon this subject, and what I trust they believe, by voting this extraordinary honor to the memory of Judge Taney.

Mr. President, it is said, and perhaps truly—I have no doubt of it—that every Chief Justice that has heretofore sat there has been an eminent, excellent man. I believe that Chief Justice Marshall was such a man; I believe that Chief Justice Jay was such a man. If I were called upon now to vote a marble bust to the memory of those men I would willingly do it. But, Mr. President, I should feel that I had done them no honor any more than the man who makes the register, and puts their names in to show that they have been Chief Justices. I should do no honor to the memory of Marshall or Jay if at the same time that I voted a marble bust to them I voted a marble bust to the memory of the author of the Dred Scott decision. I want, sir, to mark my disapprobation and condemnation of that now, here, forever, and at all times. I am not afraid that an impartial posterity, I am not afraid that the considerate, thinking, reflecting men of the present day, will accuse me of any hyena-like ferocity on the ground that I want to prey upon the fame, character, and reputation of the dead. I do not want to do so; and I have not said what I have said from any such feelings, but I have said it because I want to vote upon this subject consistently and as I believe my duty is, and for that reason I have assigned these as the motives that will govern me.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have no heart to follow any man to the grave with reproaches, nor to dishonor his name or defame his memory. I heed that voice of nature that bids us deal gently with the errors of humanity when the grave has closed forever. But I am impelled by an imperative sense of duty to vote against this joint resolution to perpetuate in marble the features of the judge who pronounced the Dred Scott decision, that greatest crime in the judicial annals of the Republic. Sir, it seems to me that the loyal millions of the nation who were horrified eight years ago by the promulgation of the blackest crime against man in our history will be surprised to see the Senate of the United States, on this, the 23d day of February, 1865, voting honors to the author of the judicial usurpation that enthroned the dark spirit of slavery from which the slave-masters leaped into this bloody rebellion. Sir, eight years ago the people, the humane, Christian people of America, were horrified when that decision, which blasted the hopes of a race and allowed slavery to pour itself out without restraint, was pronounced. From that hour to this that decision has been the abhorrence, the scoff and jeer of the patriotic hearts of America. The people, the loyal people of our struggling country, condemn that Dred Scott decision as a violation of the spirit of the Constitution of their country and an outrage upon our common humanity. Yes, sir, the people who sent us here are, by an uncounted majority, against that judicial crime and its author. Yet we, the chosen representatives of a people who have reversed that unrighteous decree, trampled it beneath our feet with loathing and scorn unutterable, sitting here in the closing hours of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, with an empty Treasury, with $130,000,000 due the heroes of the Republic who are fighting, bleeding, dying to defend their country, menaced by armed treason born of the Dred Scott decision, are consuming precious time and giving our voices and votes to take $1,000 out of the pockets of the people, to keep out of the hands of our soldiers, outstretched to receive them, $1,000 to set up a bust to the memory of the man who did more than all other men that ever breathed the air or trod the soil of the North American continent to plunge the nation into this bloody revolution. The Dred Scott decision, proclaimed when the aggressions of the slave-masters had reddened the sods of Kansas, enthroned the slave power, from which it leaped into revolution. You know, sir, and I know, that when the slave-masters had raised the banners of civil war, Judge Taney, who had been swift for thirty years to utter their decrees, had no aid to give his struggling country. In its hour of humiliation, trial, and agony, he never gave one cheering word nor performed one act to protect or save. He sank into his grave without giving a cheering word or a helping hand to the country he had vainly sought to place forever by judicial authority under the iron rule of the slave-masters. His sympathies and feelings were ever with the class whose willing instrument he had been for more than a generation.

Sir, it is not in the power of the Congress of the United States to affect his reputation with the present or with the coming ages. Laudations, statues, and busts will be as impotent as were the eulogies pronounced by a few conservative gentlemen in the Supreme Court-Room a few weeks ago. You may, sir, erect statues to him; you may pass resolutions, you may pronounce eulogies; but the future, the coming future, grand and great, of emancipated, disenthralled, and regenerated America will place him just where it will place others who were recreant to liberty and humanity. That future will declare that he nurtured the spirit of slavery, strengthened its power, enthroned it, hedged it around with judicial authority, till it, in the pride and arrogance of its power, raised its hand against the nation, and rushed headlong into the fire and blood of civil war.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I was a little surprised at the course taken by the Senator from New Hampshire. He was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, as far as I recollect—he will set me right if I am wrong—he did not express a word of dissent to this report. It would have been but fair to the committee, I think, if he had determined to oppose this bill, or thought that it was one which should not be passed, that he should have given us some notice of it, that we might have tried if we could to set him right, or have been ready to hear him when he should think proper to assail it in the Senate. But, irrespective of the fact that he took no part against this bill in committee, but, on the contrary, assented to it, I am not so much surprised at his opposing it now, because, for the last twenty years his favorite topic has been the Supreme Court and the abuse of it. Long before the Dred Scott case was decided he came to the conclusion that, if there was honesty on the bench, there was nothing but folly. He brought to the test of the wisdom which should illustrate that bench his own high standard; and believing that some of its members were below himself he came to the very rational conclusion that they were not fit to be members of that tribunal.

Now, sir, as to the other fact on which he relies, that the court designedly kept back the decision until 1856 for a corrupt purpose, I am amazed that the honorable member should yield to such a suspicion. The case was argued late in the term of 1855, and the court supposed that the argument had not been exhausted, and they directed a second argument, and the second argument was made by counsel who did not appear in the first, and the court made the decision just as soon after the argument as it was expected they would make it. That honorable member, [Mr. HALE,] and he who spoke last, [Mr. WILSON,] and the other from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] have thought proper to say that the late Chief Justice was the author of this wicked opinion, this horrible opinion; this opinion that revolts the humanity of the country! He was but one of eight or nine judges who concurred with him. It was concurred in by that man whose purity no one will dare to question, who has stood out loyal against all the influences of his own section and is now upon the bench, Mr. Justice WAYNE. Mr. Justice CATRON, who is as loyal as either of the honorable members from Massachusets, and, if they will permit me to say so, more serviceable to the cause of loyalty than either of them—and in that remark I include the honorable member from New Hampshire—concurred. Mr. Justice Grier, who has decided the prize cases and given to the honorable members the benefit of the doctrine upon which they are relying for other purposes, concurred with him. It is wrong in point of fact, it is illogical and unjust, to attribute such influence to the Chief Justice as would cause the three honorable officers to whom I have alluded to, yield their own judgments either upon matters of law or matters of policy to the Chief Justice.

The honorable member from Massachusetts who spoke first [Mr. SUMNER] has quoted from the decision in the Dred Scott case a passage which has been used for the same purpose in his region, and has answered its purpose; it was to effect a party object, and they have used it so as to assist in accomplishing that object. He has read that portion of the opinion and has denounced it as at war with all history and repugnant to the feeling of the human heart; and it has been published in Massachusetts as a mere extract from a single sentence in which it is to be found, without giving either what precedes or what succeeds it, and without giving the historical facts upon which the Chief Justice relied, or without stating his own individual opinion of the sentiment which he supposes those historic facts proved to be the sentiment of the country at that time. What is the fact? I will not refer to what he quotes in the legislation of Maryland. What does he quote from the legislation of Massachusetts and Connecticut? I pass by the Maryland act.

"The other colonial law to which we refer was passed by Massachusetts in 1705, (chap. 6.)"

The accuracy of the references I have never heard called in question.

"It is entitled 'An act for the better preventing of spurious and mixed issue,' &c.; and it provides that 'if any negro or mulatto shall presume to smite or strike any person of the English or other Christian nation, such negro or mulatto shall be severely whipped, at the discretion of the justices before whom the offender shall be convicted.'"

"And that none of her Majesty's English or Scottish subjects, nor of any other Christian nation within this province, shall contract matrimony with any negro or mulatto; nor shall any person duly authorized to solemnize marriage presume to join any such in marriage, on pain of forfeiting the sum of £50; one moiety thereof to her Majesty, for and toward the support of the Government within this province, and the other moiety to him or them that shall inform and sue for the same in any of her Majesty's courts of record within the province, by bill, plaint, or information.""

Then he quotes from the legislation of Connecticut, and adds:

"We refer to these historical facts for the purpose of showing the fixed opinions concerning that race upon which the statesmen of that day spoke and acted."

And before making the quotation he says:

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted."

And in a succeeding part of the opinion he says that the same words which are to be found in the Declaration of Independence, if now used, would be held to include the whole of the human family.

Now, sir, when the learned gentlemen from Massachusetts and New Hampshire, [Messrs. SUMNER and HALE,] and the equally learned gentleman who spoke last from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON] expressed such a decided opinion against the correctness of the Dred Scott decision; I wonder it did not occur to them, one of them not being a lawyer even, one of them being a lawyer for a few months and then ceasing, and the other not in a very extended practice until lately, that it was barely possible that such men as Taney, and Wayne, and Catron, and Grier might be right, and they might be wrong. But no; they are infallible; the world is in error and the Senators from Massachusetts and New Hampshire are not. Great men, towering intellects, with knowledge unparalleled; not the equals but the superiors of the men who have heretofore figured upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, or who have ministered as officers before its bar! Let me say to the honorable members, that humble as I hold my own ability, I should feel it much more humble (and I speak it in a spirit of absolute humility) if I thought I was not equal to either of the honorable members, and particularly to him who spoke last, upon a question of law. I thought when I argued that case, and have thought ever since, that the decision was right.

Now, a word more and I have done. The honorable member who spoke last, with that taste which always characterizes him, saw proper to say that the memory of the Chief Justice is not to be saved by eulogies pronounced by a few men who collect in the Supreme Court-Room for that purpose. I do not think (and I do not mean to say anything unkind of the honorable member when I say it) the men who were there stand in need of his eulogy; and they are not likely much to suffer from his condemnation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I did not hear the first remarks of the Senator from Maryland; I was called out of the Chamber; but I came in while he was talking, and I gathered from what fell from him that he was censuring me or reproving me for not intimating my dissent from this bill when it was up in the committee. I will not have a question of veracity with the Senator from Maryland, but I will say, and I hope it will refresh his recollection when I do say it, that if there is a man in the world whose mouth should be forever shut against making that charge it is the honorable Senator from Maryland; for although I understand it not to be within the rules of the body to refer to what took place in committee, yet, as the honorable Senator has provoked me to it, and has introduced the subject, reproving me for not doing it, I will state exactly what did occur. It was only a few days ago, and of course I am governed by memory—there was very little conversation when the bill was taken up—it was agreed that it should be recommended. I took the bill up, called the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland to it, who was its particular advocate, and said I, "Mr. Johnson, I want you to understand, though I have made no noise against this bill in committee, I am opposed to it, and shall oppose it in the Senate."

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member said so I have entirely forgotten it, and I am not alone in that particular; no other member of the committee has any recollection of it.

Mr. HALE. I did not say it to anybody else. The Senator made some facetious remark, I do not remember what it was, to me upon the subject; and if I remember my existence, remember that. There was no great discussion upon it; but if I ever said anything in my life, and my memory is to be depended upon for three days, I did say that to the honorable Senator from Maryland, and he made some answer to it which I do not remember now, but it seems to me that if the honorable Senator taxes his memory it cannot have entirely escaped it.

Perhaps I might as well sit down now, as I do not want to say anything else; but the honorable Senator seems to think that when he censures and reproves both the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and myself he is doing a great deal. If there is one single thing in the history of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that I have congratulated him for and think he is lucky in it is that he was not educated a lawyer. There is no knowing what legal nonsense he might have babbled here if he had had his strong good sense spoiled in the technicalities of Blackstone and the black-letter decisions of the old English courts. He was saved from that, and he stands here now as nature made him, an honest, sensible man.

Mr. President, in saying this I do not mean to say anything disparaging to the profession; and I need not, for the honorable Senator from Maryland intimates that I am not so much of a lawyer as to hurt me a great deal. [Laughter.] That statement was accompanied by a profession of humility; but in my judgment, so far as my experience goes, real, genuine humility, such as you will find in the Pilgrim's Progress, is not uttered with such a dogmatical manner, and in such a vociferous tone as the honorable Senator from Maryland takes when he is going to profess a great deal of humility. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in uttering the few words I felt it my duty to utter to-day against this resolution, I did not expect to excite the wrath of the honorable Senator from Maryland. That Senator, full of indignation, crosses to this side of the Chamber, and in manner and tone that hardly became even him, makes a personal attack upon those of us who have had the temerity to oppose this ill-timed measure. Swelling with indignation, the honorable Senator so far forgot the proprieties of this Chamber as to speak of my want of legal training. Sir, this is the Senate of the United States, not a convocation of lawyers. This is a Chamber for the exercise of higher qualities than the capacity to dribble, hour after hour, into the weary ear of the Senate legal crudities learned in judicial tribunals. I never exhaust the patience of the Senate in profitless discussions of legal points plain to the comprehension of all; I wish the Senator from Maryland could say as much. Sir, the honorable Senator, who hastened with alacrity to argue the Dred Scott case must be patient under the criticisms even of gentlemen outside the legal profession. Perhaps, sir, I am quite as able to judge of the sentiments of the people concerning the Dred Scott case as is the Senator from Maryland. Lawyers equal, to say the least, to the Senator from Maryland, have pronounced that decision, in the words of one of the judges, "an assumption of authority." Sir, this Dred Scott decision has gone down under the common sense and the general judgment of the American people, and from their verdict there lies no appeal. The Senator from Maryland should remember that an uncounted majority of the loyal people of the United States have pronounced the Dred Scott opinion inhuman, unchristian, and unconstitutional. The Senator may cling to that godless decree; it is quite natural that he should "cling to errors past," but the nation has discarded it and disowned the men who proclaimed it as the law of Christian America.

But the Senator takes offense to a casual allusion to the eulogies pronounced in the Supreme Court a few weeks ago. I thought, and I still continue to think, that the judgment of the future is not likely to be determined any more than was the judgment of Maryland last autumn by that Senator. Nor is the judgment of the future likely to be determined by the utterances of Charles O'Connor, whose recorded sentiments are abhorrent to the reason of the nation. Sir, it was fitting that the Senator from Maryland, who hastened to instruct Judge Taney to decree all laws to keep slavery out of the Territories unconstitutional, and Mr. Charles O'Connor, who maintains the right of the slave-master to take his slave into the free States, should pronounce eulogies upon him who had decreed the right of the slave-masters to carry their slaves without restraint into the Territories. It is more fitting that these two champions of the rights of the slave-masters should eulogize the judge smitten with judicial blindness than it is for Senators who were borne into this Chamber on a wave of popular indignation against the aggressive policy of the slave power.

Sir, Senators may forget or forgive crimes against a harmless and long-suffering race; they may forget or forgive crimes against liberty; but the people forget not nor forgive not. This day and this hour the common sense, the judgment, the heart, the conscience of loyal America repudiates the Dred Scott iniquity and the men who proclaimed it. I am asked to forget the great crime, the crime of our history, to comply with a customary usage, and place in the sight of a regenerated tribunal the bust of the chief actor. For twenty-nine years I have never given a vote or uttered a word to sustain slavery. God has given me the priceless opportunity to give voice and ballot against the giant crime of my country. I am grateful for the opportunity, and have hailed and welcomed it. Slavery is rapidly sinking into the grave of dishonor, to rise no more forever. I have neither eulogies to utter nor statues to erect to the memory of its apologists or champions. I give no vote, Mr. President, now that any man of the present or of the future who shall see it or read it can construe into a vote to applaud or honor him who has been the enemy of freedom in America.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I was here at the time the Dred Scott decision was pronounced. I had been struggling prior to that time in a very small minority in this Senate for the recognition of the rights of the free States. I had seen them trampled under foot by the Senate and by the Congress of the United States. I had seen myself and others who were associated with me denounced in the public prints which were paid out of the Treasury of the United States for our endeavors to resist the torrent of oppression and wrong that seemed to pervade the nation. Daily as we took up the newspapers which were upheld and supported by the Treasury of the United States we saw attempts to set the populace upon us as we passed to and fro between our lodgings and this Capitol. We had then scarcely power enough in the Senate to call for the yeas and nays, so that we might record our opinions upon any question. Then was got up this partisan Dred Scott decision, to give judicial sanction to the enormous iniquity that prevailed in every branch of our Government at that period. We know how it was brought up. Dred Scott was an old negro, who was worth nothing, notwithstanding the high price at which negroes were held at that time. He was made the John Doe in order to raise this issue before the court, which everybody foresaw would decide it in one way.

Sir, talk not to me of judicial independence; talk not to me of judicial sagacity and ability—the greater you make Judge Taney's legal acumen the more you dishonor his memory by showing that he sinned against light and knowledge. It would be more for his fame if you could prove him a fool. Talk not to me of the ability and purity of a man who makes such a decision as that for no better purpose than to enslave forever nearly five million people and subjugate the whole North to the dominion of those who held slaves.

I tell you, sir, that case arose in no sense as a judicial case. It was a political case. It was got up in the name of Dred Scott, who was supposed to have no authority to sue, at a time when he was seventy years old and entirely decrepit and broken down. It was at that time that it was proposed to interpose a suit for his freedom, because he had been permitted to reside in free States and Territories, and because the whole current of judicial decisions had been that a slave who was permitted by his master to reside in free Territories and free States thereby became a free man. It was necessary, in order to enable the slave power to dominate your Territories, that that good old doctrine of the common law should be subverted. Who should do it? Was the ignorant old negro Dred Scott well calculated to sue in the courts of the United States for his freedom? Not at all; but politicians bent on the subjugation of the North and the enslavement of mankind got up the suit. History will not mistake it; mankind will not misunderstand it; and they do not misunderstand it now.

The case arose, I believe, in Missouri. There was a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, or rather a plea in abatement, alleging that Dred Scott had no right to sue in the courts of the United States. The court sustained that plea. They held that a person of African descent like Dred Scott had no right to sue in the courts of the United States, and there properly ended the case.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is wholly mistaken. The court in Missouri decided that he had a right to sue, and his counsel brought up the case.

Mr. WADE. Very well; the Supreme Court that you boast of held that he could not sue, that he had no right here. Why did you not drop your case there? You talk about law and judicial decisions. The Senator knows, as the judges knew, and as we all knew, that the case ended with that decision; and if it had not been for base political reasons, the suit would have ended there. It was not, however, permitted to end there. I do not profess to have much legal sagacity, but I do profess that my opinion and the opinion of the Senators from Massachusetts and of the Senator from New Hampshire are as reliable as that of the feed attorney in the case, at all events. We have not been hired or paid for our opinion, and if it is adverse to Judge Taney's—

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask on what authority he says I was a feed attorney in that case?

Mr. WADE. I do not know that the Senator was a feed attorney.

Mr. JOHNSON. You said so.

Mr. WADE. He was an attorney in the case; and if he volunteered, so much the worse.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did volunteer.

Mr. WADE. I am sorry for it; I was in hopes you were only induced to embark in so bad a cause by an enormous fee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would rather take the court's opinion than yours on that point.

Mr. WADE. I suppose you would; and the court was more likely to be favorable to you than I should be. Sir, the decision in that case will admit of no criticism judicially. Take the opinions of Judge McLean and Judge Curtis, and they tear your Dred Scott decision to pieces, and everybody who reads them knows it. The fame of that decision and of all its proposers in spite of all the eulogies of those who pronounced them, has gone down to posterity with utter contempt and disgrace, and the people of Ohio, whose representative I am, and whose opinions I profess to represent on this floor, would pay $2,000 to hang this man in effigy rather than $1,000 for a bust to commemorate his merits. I was willing that he should sleep; but his friends injudiciously, notwithstanding all the admonitions of public sentiment upon his head, saw fit to drag him here and to propose to take money out of the Treasury to pay for a bust to commemorate him whom the world execrates.

Mr. President, I did not want to speak on this subject. I was willing that Judge Taney, like many other bad men who have figured in troublesome times, should go down to oblivion, where his friends ought to have permitted him to go. If they had been content with that, they would have heard nothing from me; but when it is proposed to take money from the pockets of my constituents to commemorate the merits of him who pronounced the Dred Scott decision, I am amazed; and I am more than amazed when I find that a committee composed as committees are composed here should think they could do honor to him who pronounced that decision by bringing such a measure as this before the Senate.

If the enunciation contained in that decision could have become the law of the land, every negro would be now and forever a slave, and not only a slave but a brute, a beast, incapable of any rights as a man, and one to whom no rights should be awarded. Not only did it trample down the negro, but your court intended to trample down the rights of freemen in the Territories forever. That is what Mr. Taney intended and expected to do.

The Senator from Maryland appeals to his coadjutors to help him out. Sir, when you propose to spend public money for a bust to any one of those who concurred with him in that infamous opinion, I will be as ready to do them justice as I am now to do it to their chief. Nor will it do to invoke what the Senator calls law. There are cases too plain for law. I say there is not a lawyer in this body who does not know that that political opinion was pronounced for political purposes and not to give anybody his rights; for as I said before, when the court came to the conclusion that Dred Scott had no standing and no rights in the court, the decision should have ended there. Why did the court go on further to pronounce opinions perfectly at war with the rights of every Territory of the United States, and of every white man therein? You cannot find any authority for it in the books. The law is that whenever in pronouncing a judgment a judge goes beyond what is necessary to decide the case before him, all that he says beyond that is no more than though it came from any other source. All that is said in the Dred Scott opinion, after announcing the conclusion of the court that Dred Scott had no right to sue, is the same as though it had been pronounced by anybody else in a bar-room or anywhere else. It has no legal efficacy. Why, then, was it pronounced? Why did they go beyond the case in order to give opinions that were to bind mankind forever? It was only part and parcel of that accursed system of usurpation which had commenced in an attempt to subvert the Territories to slavery, and afterward sought to subject all the free people of this nation to the slave power.

Sir, I feel deeply on this subject, because I was here at a time perhaps when it was hardly safe for a man to pronounce an opinion such as I pronounce now. What, sir, give money to commemorate the merits of the enunciator of the Dred Scott decision! If I were to give such a vote, it would not do for me afterward to face my constituents anywhere.

Gentlemen say that this is not given as a token of merit, but it is a kind of custom to record and perpetuate in the court-room the memory of the Chief Justices. Then, as the Senator from New Hampshire has well said, it is perfectly meaningless. If you award it to all alike, why do you have them there? They are not remarkable for their good looks. Why do you put them all there unless it is as a kind of compliment, unless it is a merit to them? I will never yield to any such rule as that. If a man stands conspicuous for his merit, for the glory of his judicial decisions for a number of years, incorruptible, unbiased by public opinion, standing for the right, I will give him a monument, for such men are very rare in our day. Find such a man, and I will withhold from him no token of merit; but this is the case of a man who, it has been said, obtained a foothold in the Supreme Court by most questionable practices. I believe, before God, he won his title to the bench by nothing but trampling your Constitution under his feet when he undertook, against law, to remove the deposits from the old Bank of the United States, because the President wanted him to do it. That I understand was his only title to this high position. His commencement then was not very good, and from it I should have expected very much such a run as he has made. I am not here to criticize the general course of his decisions; I know nothing about them; I care nothing about them, because this one decision was so palpably wrong in point of law, and so contrary to the common sense, the common judgment, and the common propriety of mankind, that it has met with universal condemnation; and no attempt of the Senate to prop it up, as my friend from Massachusetts has well said, will have any other effect than to make the infamy of the decision more lasting and conspicuous.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, I have but a word or two to submit, not so much for the consideration of Senators as in explanation of the vote that I shall give. I think if the debate be correct I entirely misapprehend what would be the effect of this bill if it should receive the sanction of the Senate. I do not believe we can honor Chief Justice Taney by perpetuating his features in marble, but I do believe the Senate by voting to embody the features of Taney in marble will do honor to itself. Nor do I believe that in voting for the resolution I can be regarded as indorsing the many able and learned opinions delivered by that distinguished jurist during the many years he presided in the Supreme Court. If such were to be the effect of my vote I should want time to review those decisions. The passage of this resolution cannot add to or its rejection detract from the fame of Taney; his memory will be cherished by the wise and the good long after the names of those who now strut their little hour upon the political stage will have been forgotten.

It may be that the decision of the Dred Scott case was sought and obtained for political purposes, but the late lamented Chief Justice had no agency in bringing that case before the court. He found it before him, it was his duty as a judge to decide upon it, and as an able, upright, and wise judge, as he was, he decided it. No one is authorized to say that his decision was in accordance with his own views as a man or that the law as expounded by him was what he would have made it; but he decided it as every honest judge must decide, and as he did decide every case before him, according to the law as it was under the Constitution which he had sworn to support and to expound as a member of the highest judicial tribunal in the land.

The passage of this resolution cannot, I repeat, add to the fame of Chief Justice Taney; that fame will live and his memory will be cherished long after the Constitution which he expounded and the Government which he sought to perpetuate under it shall have passed away. I shall vote for the proposition in order that my country may be saved the stigma that history would have to record if we should refuse to one who so long and so worthily filled the place where Jay and Marshall sat the same mark of respect that has been shown to his predecessors.

Mr. SUMNER. At last I have the floor again. I rose at once to reply to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] when he made his obnoxious vindication of the present proposition; but the floor was given to others. And now as I look at the clock I see that I can only begin what I have to say.

As I listened to the Senator I was reminded of a character known to the Roman church who figures at the canonization of a saint, under the name of l'Avvocato del Diavolo, which is nothing else than Devil's Advocate. The Senator may not perform precisely the same function, but the earnestness with which he advocates a cause which has as its inspiration the very spirit of evil suggests the parallel. Again let me say that I am sorry to be drawn into this debate. But they who seek to canonize one of the tools of slavery are responsible. Tancy shall not be recognized as a saint by any vote of Congress if I can help it.

The Senator has a bad cause, and I inferred that he thought so himself; first, because he talked so loud, and secondly, because he became personal. A good cause would have been discussed in a softer voice, and there would have been no occasion for personality. But the Senator becomes personal easily. In the sweep of his movement he brushed against my distinguished friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] and also against my colleague and myself, simply because we could not join in the canonization of the author of the Dred Scott decision. The Senator from New Hampshire and my colleague have already answered him in proper terms. But I will say for my colleague what he could not say for himself. He can bear the gibes of the Senator because he is not a lawyer. It is true that he is not, like that Senator, a counselor of the Supreme Court of the United States, but as an observer in this Chamber, I say fearlessly that in all the duties of a Senator he is in every respect the equal of the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour prescribed by the Senate for that purpose having arrived, the Senate will now take a recess till seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at seven o'clock p. m.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 667) to provide for two local inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and for two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to reestablish the board of local inspectors at Wheeling, and also to amend the act approved June 8, 1864, entitled "An act to create an additional inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection districts of Memphis and Oregon, and for other purposes."

A bill (H. R. No. 697) further to provide for the verification of invoices;

A bill (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;

A bill (H. R. No. 780) to extend the provisions of the first section of "An act for the government of persons in certain fisheries," approved June 19, 1813; and

A bill (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor.

The bill (H. R. No. 764) to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. No. 579) to repeal a portion of the joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, punish treason and rebellion, and to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to put that bill upon its passage. The Senate has passed the same provision.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see no object in referring it. The same bill has been before the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Senate has passed the same provision incorporating it in another bill that has been defeated in the report of a committee of conference. There is no necessity for referring it. If the Senator objects to acting upon it at this time, let it go upon the table for the present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know not what part the Senator took this morning in regard to the disposition of a bill that came from the House of Representatives, and the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] informed the Senate that it had already been considered by the committee of the Senate, and when it was proposed to refer the House bill he opposed the reference for the reason that it had been considered by the Committee on Public Lands. The Senate overruled his motion and sent it to the committee as a matter of course. I only allude to it as a question of consistency.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This particular measure has passed both Houses. It is not a measure that now comes from the House of Representatives for the first time, which would, as an ordinary thing, and doubtless should be, referred. This very identical thing, which is the repeal of a part of a law, has been passed by the two Houses. I will not urge action upon the measure now if the Senator objects and wants it to go over, but I see no object in referring it; we have considered the same measure in the Judiciary Committee and reported upon it.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

CAPITOL HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 452) to incorporate the Capitol Hotel Company in Washington city, District of Columbia. I am told that the parties are ready to proceed at once to the erection of a hotel such as ought to be erected in this city for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that motion be agreed to will it displace the bill upon which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. WILSON. I moved to have a session this evening for the purpose of disposing of five or six military bills that have been passed by the House of Representatives, and I think we can get through with them in half an hour.

Mr. DIXON. The bill which I have moved to take up is one introduced by the Senator himself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to proceeding with other business so as to displace the regular order, but I have no objection to this bill coming up informally.

Mr. DIXON. Very well, let it come up informally, by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. I think this bill can afford to wait for a few days while we get other business attended to of great public interest.

Mr. DIXON. It is only a few lines.

Mr. CONNESS. I have been two weeks trying to get the floor to call up a bill of great consequence to my constituents.

Mr. DIXON. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill I have named.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 452) to incorporate the Capitol Hotel Company in Washington city, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The incorporators are Charles C. Little and A. C. Washburn, of Boston; George Folsom, Charles A. Stetson, and Frank Moore, of New York; Z. C. Robbins, of Washington, and their associates and successors. The capital stock is not to exceed $1,500,000, divided into shares of $1,000 each.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 729) to amend the act relating to officers employed in the examination of imported merchandise in the district of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 739) to regulate the fees of custom-house officers, on the northern, north-eastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly, in Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to change the name of the ship William F. Storer to Montana.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States from interfering in elections in the States;

A bill (H. R. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes;

A bill (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 373) to aid in the construction of a telegraphic line from St. Cloud, in Minnesota, to the British possessions, reported it with an amendment.

TOWN LOTS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 380) to give title to the occupants of lots in cities and towns in the State of California, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This amendment was proposed at the General Land Office. The bill as introduced by the Senator from California was referred to the Commissioner by the Committee on Public Lands, and the Commissioner suggested this as a substitute. I will say to the Senate that the law of last year provided for the sale of coal mineral lands at public sale at not less than twenty dollars an acre. This bill, prepared by the Commissioner, gives the right of preemption to persons who are now occupying and developing coal mines for general purposes, at twenty dollars an acre.

The second section, in respect to towns now built up, waives two things: first, the restriction in quantity of six hundred and forty acres, which was a restriction in the act of last year; and second, as to the extent of the lots. The Government is not interested in restricting the extent of the towns under the law of last year, because the larger the town the more money the Government gets; but I desire to suggest to the Senator from California, and also to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, whether there ought not to be some restriction as to the size of lots. It will be recollected by the chairman of the committee that the bill of last year fixes the price of town lots at ten dollars. This bill has no limitation as to the size of the lots. Ought there not to be, in view of that fact, some limitation?

Mr. HARLAN. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana is a wise one, and I suggest further to him that it might be made double the size indicated in the law to which this is an amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to explain this second section so that it may be understood. I have before me the act passed last year, which is to be found on page 354 of the Statutes of that year, and it provides that persons disposed to lay out a town upon public lands of the United States may proceed by having a plat made, the whole area of which shall not exceed six hundred and forty acres, dividing it into lots of a given size, of a given number of square feet, and that upon the return of that plat to the land office, and from the local land office, after being approved there, to the General Land Office at Washington, the parties wishing to purchase those lots may do so, and get a patent from the General Land Office here at a price of ten dollars per lot. The maximum size of the lot is stated.

This is a very good act for the establishment of all new towns upon the public domain, but it happens not to be applicable to a State like ours where our towns are already established and not laid out in accordance with such a regulation, or with such conditions. Therefore, upon consulting the General Land Office in regard to it, the Commissioner concluded that the old act had better be amended by simply removing the restriction as to the maximum size of each lot and as to the maximum size of the area of the town or the whole plat. Perhaps in California there will be not more than two or three towns that will exceed the entire area of six hundred and forty acres. Those cases will be the city of San José, the city of Benicia, and perhaps the city of Petaluma. All the cities and towns, amounting to a great many, in our State have been petitioning for the passage of separate acts giving them title. It was deemed by the Land Office the safest plan and the best to pass an amendment to the general act.

I do not know how you can regulate the matter by doubling the size allowed here as the maximum size of each lot, because the lots in these towns are not only various in size, but they are various as to form, and it is proposed to accept them as they are, it being quite impossible to change them, they being now towns long settled and upon which improvements exist. As to the price to be paid for each lot in the case of lots that exceed the maximum rate stated here, I would have no objection to an increase; but the object is not to get revenue from these towns, but to give an opportunity to the owners of lots in them to obtain title.

I desire to offer an amendment to the first section, and if there be no objection I will offer it now; and I beg to call the attention of the Senators who have had this matter under consideration to the character of the amendment. I propose that it shall come in in the fifth line of the first section, after the word "lands," where I propose to insert the words "except on lands reserved by the President of the United States for public uses." If this reservation is not made, the result would be that persons could carry on their mining operations and get a title to reservations of the Government, which I do not wish; and there is a case to which I need not now call attention that has specifically made this necessary. I therefore offer this amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting at the end of the second section:

And provided further, That the lots shall not exceed in size twice the size of the lots as fixed in the act to which this is an amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the honorable Senator that in the case of most of our towns that would be a great grievance. Those towns consist of little homesteads built upon the public domain, surrounded by their little orchards, and all their household gods are there. You propose to draw a line right through a man's possession and cut off half of it, and say he shall not have it; that the trees he has planted with his own hands and the vines he has nursed for ten years past shall not be his. I hope that will not be done. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he allow the price to be increased if necessary where there is an excess; but that is hardly an object. You cannot reduce the size of these lots. It is provided that you shall allow them to make plats of these towns and villages according to their present boundaries, according to their present lines and improvements. It is a matter of very small consequence to the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. Will this amendment meet the views of the Senator from California?

Provided, That the minimum price of any lot larger than the maximum size named in the act to which this is an amendment shall be increased in proportion to the increased size of said lot.

Mr. CONNESS. I apprehend that in many cases the lot would not be worth the price.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be satisfied with the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. I think that will accomplish what I desire to accomplish by this amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose under the circumstances to lay the bill over for the present and go on with other business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) to extend the time for constructing the Burlington and Missouri River railroad in Iowa, and filing a map of relocation.

Mr. HARLAN. This is a very small matter, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to put the resolution on its passage now. It merely extends the time for completing certain sections of a railroad one year, and makes a little amendment in relation to the time at which the company shall file a map as to the relocation of their line. There is nothing else in it, and it is important that it should go through speedily.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was read three times, and passed. It proposes to extend for one year the time allowed by the eighth section of the act of May 15, 1856, for the construction annually of sections of twenty miles each of the Burlington and Missouri railroad, and to repeal the provisions of the second section of the act approved July 1, 1864, entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of registers and receivers of the land offices in the several States and Territories in the location of lands to States and corporations under grants of Congress," which require that a map of the change of location shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office within one year.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to change the name of the ship William F. Storer to Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 729) to amend the act relating to officers employed in the examination of imported merchandise in the district of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 739) to regulate the fees of custom-house officers on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly in Massachusetts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States."

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to take up to-night three or four military bills that have been passed by the other House. I move first to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With the indulgence of the Senator from Massachusetts I desire to state that after he gets through with his military bills to-night, or if we cannot have time then, to-morrow in the morning hour I shall move to take up a very important bill in relation to Indian affairs in the Indian Territory that requires immediate action. That Territory is in a terrible condition as it now stands, and is costing the Government a very large sum of money. We hope that an organization of the Indian tribes properly under something in the nature of a civil government may in some measure in all events prevent the continuance of this condition of things. I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to that bill, which was printed and laid on our tables to-day, and I want to have it acted on to-night after the Senator gets through with his bills, if we have time.

The motion of Mr. WILSON was agreed to, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of War in connection with the Army Register for the year 1865, to cause to be printed and published a full roster or roll of all general, field, line, and staff officers of volunteers who have been in the Army of the United States since the beginning of the present rebellion, showing whether they are yet in the service, or have been discharged therefrom, and giving casualties and other explanations proper for such Register. And to defray in whole or in part the expenses of this publication, an edition of fifty thousand copies of such enlarged Register is to be published and may be sold to officers, soldiers, or citizens, at a price which shall not more than cover the actual cost of paper, printing, and binding, and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported the joint resolution with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out in lines three and four the words "in connection with the Army Register for the year 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "at any time" before "since" in line eight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "rebellion," in line nine, to insert "including all informal organizations which have been recognized or accepted and paid by the Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen, to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five," so as to read "twenty-five thousand copies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "binding," in line eighteen, to strike out the words "and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the resolution read the third time. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL COLLETT, JR.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to cause the name of Daniel Collett, jr., who died of wounds received in battle, to be entered and borne upon the rolls of the Army as a first lieutenant of the fortieth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry from the 9th of May, 1864, the date at which he was commissioned to that office by the Governor of the State of Ohio, the same as if he had been on that day mustered in as such first lieutenant.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CANAL SURVEYS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) to authorize surveys to be made with a view to the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, and improve the navigation of the Illinois river, to improve the Upper rapids and Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, and to improve the navigation of Fox and Wisconsin rivers, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to direct that competent engineers be employed for the purpose of making the necessary examinations and surveys with a view to the construction of a ship-canal, as a military work for the use of the Government of the United States, around the falls of Niagara, in the State of New York, commencing at some convenient point on the Niagara river, above the falls, and terminating at some convenient point below upon the same stream, or upon the shore of Lake Ontario; to make the necessary examinations and surveys with a view to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, supplying the same with water from Lake Michigan, and to improve the navigation of the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers in such a manner as to insure a safe and uninterrupted navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river for naval and war vessels, and to improve the Upper rapids and Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river; to make the necessary examinations and surveys with a view to improve the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, to enlarge the canals, locks, and draws on and between those rivers, and to construct such additional works, thereon in such manner as to furnish a suitable and sufficient water communication for gunboats and other naval and war vessels of the United States, between Lake Michigan, at Green Bay, and the Mississippi river; and to report a proximate estimate of the expense of constructing such works and making such alterations and improvements. Ten thousand dollars is appropriated to defray the expense of the surveys, examinations, and reconnaissances.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to a commission to survey these proposed improvements and estimate the amounts which they will cost, unless such a provision is to carry with it an implication that nothing more is to be done. A bill has been passed by the House of Representatives for the opening of a ship-canal between the waters of Lake Michigan and those of the Mississippi river; that bill is now pending in the Senate, I believe. If we are to pass a bill or resolution directing a commission to go and survey that route to ascertain what the expense is to be, I should presume it was the understanding that we were to do nothing with the bill which has been passed by the other House. Now, sir, it is a fact that this route was surveyed several years ago, in the first place by engineers in the employment of the State of Illinois, and since that by a Government engineer. The whole work has been planned; the number of yards of excavation necessary to deepen the canal to have the requisite amount of water, the character of the excavation, whether of rock or earth, and its probable cost, have all been estimated for. Plats of the whole of it have been made not only by the engineers in the employment of the State of Illinois, but by a Government engineer designated by the President of the United States; and surely there can be no necessity for delaying the work upon that improvement for the purpose of making a new survey. I am prepared to bring those surveys to the notice of the Senate or of the committee, and show them that this whole ground has been examined and as accurate estimates made as can possibly be made of the character of the work to be done, and all about it. Why you should make an appropriation to survey the work over again I do not know, unless it is with a view of delaying action upon the other bill.

I cannot speak in reference to the other works. This joint resolution relates to the construction of a canal around the falls of Niagara as well as the deepening of the canal between Lake Michigan and the waters of the Mississippi river, and it also has reference to an improvement of the Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi and of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers. There are several things in it. I did hope we were to have some action upon the bill from the House of Representatives in regard to the Illinois and Michigan canal, and I should be very glad if we could take up and consider that measure. I do not know whether the Senator from Massachusetts designs to use this joint resolution for the purpose of defeating that bill. I certainly have no objection to this measure unless it is to be used as an excuse for not going on with the other and seeing what we can do with it. It is hardly advisable to make an appropriation to go on and make a survey of the route unless the Senator from Massachusetts has some reason to suppose that the surveys which have been made are not accurate. A survey has been made under the present Administration since it came into power, and we have plats of the whole improvement and everything in regard to it.

Mr. WILSON. Various measures contemplating the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, the deepening of the Illinois river and canal, the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and the improvement of the Mississippi at the Des Moines rapids, were sent to the Committee on Military Affairs. Whatever may be the views of members of the committee in regard to the expediency of completing any one or all of these works, it was the opinion of the committee that in the present condition of the finances we ought not to enter upon any of them. The committee, however, did not report for or against these several propositions, but reported them back without any recommendation, and also reported this joint resolution authorizing a survey of these various works under the direction of the President, and appropriating $10,000 for that purpose; and I am told by General Delafield that this sum of money will accomplish the object, and that the surveys and estimates can be made in a few months.

I say to the Senator from Illinois that the passage of this joint resolution will certainly not prevent his moving to take up the bill referred to by him, or prevent any action which he may choose to take in regard to it; but the committee did not think in the present condition of the country, however important those works are to the country both as military and commercial measures, that we ought to enter on such a great expenditure at the present time. I am in favor of finishing the improvement to which the Senator has referred; I reported in favor of it at the last session, and I believe that if it were completed to-day at the cost at which it was estimated it would add tens and hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealth of the country. But, sir, the question with us now is this: we have a country to save, rather than one to improve, and we have got a Treasury that is quite too poor at the present time, both in money and in credit, to enter upon anything but necessary appropriations.

I think the Senator from Illinois had better allow this survey to be made, and if it does not apply to any great extent to the Illinois canal it certainly does to the Niagara falls canal and to these other projects that are regarded by their friends as of great importance. The passage of this resolution will not preclude the Senator from making any motion he pleases in regard to the bill referred to by him. It has not been reported either for or against, but simply reported back with a view of not prejudicing it in any way whatever. The committee were decidedly of opinion that no report they would make should prejudice any one of these measures before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether when the committee agreed upon this joint resolution they had before them the report of the engineers who were appointed to estimate the expense of making the improvement in Illinois, or whether it was known to the committee. I am aware the Senator from Massachusetts must have known it, because it was once before that committee at a former session; but was it brought to the notice of the committee that this whole work had been carefully examined and measured and estimated? If so, there should be some reason for making a new survey, some apprehension that the former surveys were not correct. If there is anything of that kind I should like to know it.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that we had the matter of the Illinois improvement before the committee on a former occasion, and I prepared a report in favor of it, and the report of the survey of Colonel, now General, Webster was a portion of it incorporated into the report of the committee. I do not think it was used by the committee at this last examination, but the members of the committee all understood that a great deal had been done to get accurate estimates of the cost of the Illinois improvement. If that matter has been fully examined, certainly the Government will spend no time or money in making any further examination of it under this resolution; but in regard to the other three improvements, the estimates are such that we cannot rely upon them, and it will certainly do no harm to examine and perhaps revise the estimates that have been made in regard to the Illinois and Michigan canal and the Illinois river.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I said before, I have no sort of objection to the passage of this resolution unless it is to be used to defeat the other bill. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts does not put it upon that ground, but he thinks it necessary to have a survey and estimate in regard to the other improvements. I do not wish to be committed or to have anybody else committed against the other measure if this joint resolution is passed. I should have preferred to have action on the other bill before this was called up, and I was not aware that the Senator from Massachusetts intended to call up this joint resolution at the present time.

Mr. WILSON. I think you had better let it pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would rather it should go over and let the other bill be acted on first.

Mr. WILSON. At the suggestion of the Senator I will let it go over and call up another bill.

The joint resolution was postponed until tomorrow.

ARMY AND MEDICAL CORPS.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 548) to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the medical director of an army in the field consisting of two or more Army corps, and the medical director of a military department in which there are United States general hospitals containing four thousand beds or upward, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and that the medical director of an Army corps in the field, or of a department in which there are United States general hospitals containing less than four thousand beds, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry. This increased rank and pay are only to continue to medical officers while discharging such special duties; and the assignments from time to time to such duty shall be at least two thirds of them made from among the surgeons and assistant surgeons of volunteers.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would inform the Senate what will be the increased pay of these officers, and how many of them will be increased. What is the necessity of it?

Mr. WILSON. The medical director of an army in the field consisting of two or more corps will be increased from a major to a colonel, and so with a medical director of a military department where there are United States general hospitals containing four thousand beds and upward. I cannot tell how many armies we have, but where ever there is an army consisting of more than one corps the medical director will be increased in rank.

I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the medical department of our Army has been less cared for perhaps than any other portion of the Army. Some of the directors of large armies after being in service for a long while, three years, are simply majors, with the same rank and pay with which they entered the service, and a great many of our best surgeons are leaving the service. They have no opportunity for promotion. No service, no fidelity, brings them an increase of pay or any reward whatever. Many of them are leaving the service and returning home, and it is with the greatest difficulty that we are getting the necessary surgeons for the Army; and unless some action is taken I believe a great many of our best surgeons will leave the service. It is in the power of a good surgeon to render immense service to the country, and to save thousands and tens of thousands of dollars in the Army and in the large departments and hospitals. I think we ought to give them this promotion. I have held back on this subject as long as I could do so with any sort of sense of justice to these men; but the public service demands that we should pass this little bill which gives an increase to a few men; but they are men who have been in the service a long while and who have had no promotion, and who have rendered great service to the country, who find that their compensation does not support themselves and their families. The most eminent medical men refuse now to go into the Army because if they do they lose their practice at home, and learn that which when they return home will be of no great value to them. I think as a matter of justice we ought to pass this bill. It was passed by the House of Representatives at the last session, and we have held it back here until this time.

Mr. HALE. I do not doubt anything the Senator states, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to this bill. The difficulty is this bill does not remedy the evil the Senator complains of.

There have been no great resignations of medical directors, nor of that very limited number who will get increased pay by this bill. The Senator did not tell us how much pay this bill gives, but my impression is that it gives something like a thousand dollars; I am not certain; I have been so told. The difficulty is not in the ranks of the men whose pay you propose here to increase, but it is among the regimental surgeons, those who are not occupying such high posts, that the resignations which the Senator speaks of take place. I happen to have some little knowledge of this subject, because I have ascertained that there is no want of surgeons at the present time, and from a circumstance which I will state. I know a very fair surgeon, I will not say a distinguished man, but a man who stands very fair, who was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts as a surgeon in one of their regiments. After he had been in the field some time he had to leave not long ago on account of his health. He was a man of very high qualifications and had very high testimonials from all the medical and other officers of Massachusetts. He has recovered his health, and finds it impossible to get service in the medical corps again from the fact that there are no vacancies for him, no place where he can go in. That is the case at this moment, so that I do not apprehend there is such a want as the Senator thinks; and if there are resignations taking place they are taking place not among those whose pay will be raised by this bill.

It is useless to repeat what I have said many times before: I do not think this is the time to largely increase or to increase at all the pay of these men. I am opposed to it because I think it is unnecessary and inexpedient, and if you pass the bill it will not remedy the evil; there will be just as much complaint among those who are not high up on the list as there is now. The truth is that if there is any complaint, it is among surgeons who get small pay, and this bill does not increase them at all; it only increases the medical directors of armies. I hope it will not pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bucklew, Canlie, Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Weller, Wilson, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Farwell, Hale, and Riddle—3.
ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Howard, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilkinson—22.

So the bill was passed.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 600) for the better organization of the subsistence department. It provides that during the continuance of the present rebellion the Secretary of War may, when in his judgment it is necessary, assign to each geographical military division, to each separate army in the field consisting of more than one Army corps, to each military department, and to each principal subsistence depot, not exceeding ten in number, an officer of the subsistence department to act as chief commissary of such military division, army, military department, or depot, and also an officer of the subsistence department as assistant in the office of the Commissary General of Subsistence, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, is to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of the subsistence department; and, in like manner, may assign, for purposes of inspection or other special duty in the subsistence department, commissaries of subsistence, not exceeding six in number, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, is to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of the subsistence department; and to each Army corps an officer of the subsistence department to be chief commissary of the corps with the like rank of lieutenant colonel; and, in like manner, may assign to each division of two or more brigades a commissary, who, while so assigned and acting, is to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of the subsistence department; but when any one of these officers is relieved from such duty, his increased rank, pay, and emoluments are to cease, and he is to return to his commissioned rank in the subsistence department; and the officers authorized to be assigned by this act are to be selected from the commissaries of subsistence who hold commissions or rank in the volunteer service only. When within the limits of any geographical department there shall be not more than one Army corps, in such case the chief commissary of the Army corps is to perform the duties of the department commissary. During the continuance of the present rebellion the President of the United States may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as many commissaries of subsistence of volunteers, with the rank of captain, as the exigencies of the service may require.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, in section one, line thirty, after the word "that" to insert the words "at least two thirds in each grade of;" so that the proviso will read:

And provided further, That at least two thirds in each grade of the officers authorized to be assigned by this act shall be selected from the commissaries of subsistence who hold commissions or rank in the volunteer service only.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that the House bill excluded all regular Army officers from promotion in this department, and this amendment allows one third of these appointments to be from the regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a provision in the second section of this bill that I think ought not to pass. The second section provides:

That, during the continuance of the present rebellion, the President of the United States may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as many commissaries of subsistence of volunteers, with the rank of captain, as the exigencies of the service may require.

That is an authority to the President to make just as many of these officers as he thinks proper. I should like to know if it is not practicable to limit that in some way. We all know that the pressure upon the President and other officers of the Government is such that a great many persons are appointed to office whose services could be dispensed with. We have in the Army, as is known, general officers who are not on active duty. At one time we had more than one hundred generals appointed that Congress thought were unnecessary, and they limited the number afterward by law. Here is a provision to allow the President to appoint as many commissaries of subsistence as the exigencies of the service in his opinion may require. It seems to me there ought to be some limit placed upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that is the law at the present time. They appoint just as many as they think necessary for the public service, and they have appointed a great many. But the Senator must remember that there are a great many men who go out of the service. I will state to the Senator, however, that there is no need of that provision, and as the bill has been amended and will have to go back to the House of Representatives, I am perfectly willing that it shall be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do I understand that the law now is that they may appoint as many as they please?

Mr. WILSON. There is no limitation upon the number that may be appointed, and they appoint any number that they think necessary in that department to do their work. If General Eaton, of the commissary department, notifies the Secretary of War that he wants one, two, three, or any number of these men appointed, owing to resignations or increase of business, or anything of that kind, they are appointed.

Mr. JOHNSON. But those that are appointed in that way are temporary appointments. These are to be permanent, as I understand, to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. They are all appointed in that way. I think there is no need of the section, and it may as well be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see no object in striking this out if there is a provision of law of the same character already. What I desire to get at is to have a limitation somewhere. If, as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, commissaries resign or by any casualty leave the service, of course others would be appointed; but it seems to me to be a very loose way of legislating to provide that the President may make just as many of these officers as in his judgment he shall think proper. There ought to be a limit somewhere. I do not know how many commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of captain, are required. Perhaps we need one for each regiment.

Mr. WILSON. No; one for each brigade, post, and division.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well. I think the law ought so to be that there should be any number of commissaries which the public service may require, not exceeding one for every brigade and military post in the United States. Some limitation somewhere certainly ought to be imposed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think it is wholly impracticable to limit the number of quartermasters and commissaries. We might by law to-day say that so many commissaries were necessary, and to-morrow a larger number would be necessary. As you extend your base of operations, at every single military post it becomes necessary to appoint another disbursing commissary at that post. If we should limit the number to-day, perhaps we should cripple the service to-morrow, for we might need then a much greater number than we do now. I think a discretion must be left in the President or in the commissary department to appoint commissaries wherever they are necessary. I should certainly be willing to restrict the number if it were practicable, but I do not see how it can be done. For instance, when our lines were at Chattanooga we had disbursing commissaries up to that point; but at every succeeding stage, wherever we made a base of supplies, we needed another commissary, and so on as your armies advanced. It seems to me you will cripple the service by restricting them to any specific number. I do not know how many you will need, and I think it is wholly impracticable to say how many commissaries or quartermasters shall be appointed.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Illinois, further, that there are a large number of acting commissaries, that is, officers of regiments detailed to act as commissaries, and quartermasters in the department. Some of them have been acting for two years, and are pressing daily on the War Department for promotion from lieutenantcies to captaincies, but it is very seldom that any of these men are nominated. As they are doing the work, the matter is allowed to go on just as it is when a colonel is put in command of a brigade.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to strike out the second section, at any rate.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senate to take up and pass a bill which is a mere matter of form, to extend the time in which a railroad is to be completed in Michigan, and in which Indiana is interested. If there is a word of objection to it I will not press it. It is Senate bill No. 463.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 463) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes.'" It proposes to amend section one of an act to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," which amendatory act was approved June 7, 1864, so as to make the last proviso in the section read as follows:

Provided further, That the time specified in the fourth section of the act hereby amended for the completion of said road shall be, and the same is hereby, extended eight years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSOLIDATION OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 459, to provide for the consolidation of the Indian tribes, and establish civil government in the Indian Territory.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to create and establish within the territory of the United States, bounded as follows, to wit: on the north by the southern boundary of the State of Kansas, on the west by the eastern boundary of the Territory of New Mexico and the State of Texas, on the south by the northern boundary of the State of Texas, and on the east by the western boundary of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, a temporary government by the name of the Indian Territory; but this government is not to be permitted to interfere with or to affect in any way the rights of any Indian tribe at peace with the United States residing and being in the Territory, secured by treaty between the United States and such Indians, without the consent of the tribe or tribes, or to affect the authority of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the United States to make if this act had not taken effect; and nothing in this act contained is to be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing the Territory, or changing its boundaries, in such manner and at such time as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of it to any other State or Territory of the United States, after the Indian title shall have been extinguished, with the consent of the Indians residing in the Territory.

The executive power and authority in and over the Territory is to be vested in a Governor, who is to hold his office for four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. The Governor is to reside within the Territory, and to be commander-in-chief of the militia and superintendent of Indian affairs. He may grant pardons and respites for offenses against the laws of the Territory, and reprieve for offenses against the laws of the United States until the decision of the President of the United States can be made known thereon; he is to commission all officers appointed to office under the laws of the Territory; and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

There is to be a secretary of the Territory, who is to reside therein, and hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States; he is to record and preserve all laws and proceedings of the Council hereinafter constituted, and all the acts and proceedings of the Governor in his executive department; he is to transmit one copy of the laws and journals of the Council within thirty days after the end of each session, and one copy of the executive proceedings and official correspondence semi-annually, on the 1st days of January and July in each year, to the President of the United States, and two copies of the laws to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the use of Congress, and one copy to each Indian tribe located in the Territory; and in case of the death, removal, resignation, or absence of the Governor from the Territory, the secretary is required to execute and perform all the powers and duties of the Governor during such vacancy or absence, or until another Governor shall be duly appointed and qualified to fill such vacancy.

The legislative power and authority of the Territory is to be vested in the Governor and a Legislative Council. The first Legislative Council is to consist of one member for each one thousand Indians or fraction of a thousand greater than five hundred, being members of any tribe of Indians lawfully residing in the Territory, to be selected by the tribes, respectively, which may give their assent to the establishment of the temporary government provided for in this act; and if none should be thus formally elected, then to consist of the chief or chiefs of the tribe or tribes, to be taken in the order of their rank as recognized in their tribal usages. The members of the Council are to reside in and be inhabitants of the district or reservation and members of the tribe for which they may be elected respectively. Previous to the first session of the Legislative Council the Governor is to cause a census or enumeration of the several tribes residing on reservations in the Territory to be taken by such persons and in such mode as the Governor shall designate and appoint, and the persons so appointed are to receive a reasonable compensation therefor, not exceeding three dollars per day for the time necessarily employed. After the census shall have been completed, the Governor is to declare the number of members of the Council to which each of the districts or tribes is entitled under this act, and the persons entitled to represent the districts or tribes in the Council are to meet at such place and on such day as the Governor shall appoint; but thereafter the time and place of the commencement of the regular sessions of the Legislative Council is to be fixed by the Council; but no session in any one year is to exceed the term of thirty days. The Governor is to appoint a suitable person to preside at all meetings of the Council.

Every male member of any Indian tribe lawfully residing in the Territory, above the age of twenty-one years, at peace with the United States, and who has been an actual resident of the Territory for thirty days prior to the first election, is to be entitled to vote in the selection of members of the Council from the tribe of which he is a member, and eligible to a seat in the Council; but the qualifications of voters, and of members of the Council, at all subsequent elections, are to be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Council.

The legislative power of the Territory is to extend to all rightful subjects and matters pertaining to the intercourse of the Indian tribes in the Territory, and the administration of internal justice and the punishment of crimes, and the civilization and improvement of the people, consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the provisions of this act; but no law is to be in force providing for the sale, taxation, or incumbrance of real estate, or the forcible collection of debts, until approved by Congress, nor is any tax to be imposed upon the property of the United States; and no law, rule, or regulation adopted by the Council is to take effect and be in force until it receives the approval of the Governor; nor is slavery or involuntary servitude to be permitted in the Territory except in punishment of crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

The judicial power of the Territory is to be vested in a supreme court and district courts. The supreme court is to consist of a chief justice and two associate justices, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum, and who shall hold a term at the seat of government of the Territory annually; and they are to hold their offices during the period of four years, and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. The Territory is to be divided into as many judicial districts as there are Indian tribes in the Territory, and a district court is to be held in each of the districts by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such times and places as may be prescribed by law or required by the Governor; and the judges are, after their appointments, respectively, to reside in the Territory, at the place assigned them by the Governor. The supreme and district courts, respectively, are to possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction. Each district court, or the judge thereof, is to appoint its clerk, who is also to be the register in chancery, and to keep his office at the place where the court may be held. Writs of error, bills of exceptions, and appeals, are to be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of the district court to the supreme court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law. The supreme court, or the justices thereof, may appoint its own clerk; and every clerk is to hold his office at the pleasure of the court for which he shall have been appointed. Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the supreme court are to be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witnesses, exceeds $1,000, except that a writ of error or appeal is to be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the supreme court created by this act, or of any judge thereof; or of the district courts created by this act, or of any judge thereof, upon any writs of habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom. Each of the district courts is to have and exercise the same jurisdiction, in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States, subject to the limitations contained in this act; and the first six days of every term of the courts, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, is to be appropriated to the trial of causes arising under the Constitution and laws; and writs of error and appeal in all such cases are to be made to the supreme court of the Territory the same as in other cases. The clerks are to receive, in all such cases, the same fees which the clerks of the district courts of Washington Territory now receive for similar services. The supreme court and circuit courts are to recognize and enforce all laws, rules, and usages of each of the Indian tribes, lawfully residing in the Territory, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the Legislative Council.

There is to be appointed an attorney for the Territory; who is to continue in office four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, and who is to receive the same fees and salary as the attorney of the United States for the present Territory of Washington. There is also to be a marshal for the Territory appointed, who is to hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, and who is to execute all processes issuing from the courts when exercising their jurisdiction as circuit and district courts of the United States. He is to perform the duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties, and be entitled to the same fees as the marshal of the district court of the United States for the present Territory of Washington, and in addition is to be paid $200 annually as a compensation for extra services.

All officers provided for by this act, executive, legislative, and judicial, before they act as such, are respectively to take an oath or affirmation before the judge of a district court of the United States, or of the Territory, or before the Chief Justice or some associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to discharge the duties of their respective offices, and an oath of fidelity similar to the oath now required by law of members and Senators in Congress; which oaths, when so taken, are to be certified by the person by whom the same shall have been taken; and such certificates are to be received and recorded by the secretary of the Territory among the executive proceedings; and afterward the like oath or affirmation is to be taken by all civil officers holding offices in the Territory, hereafter created by law, which is to be certified and recorded in such manner and form as may be prescribed by law. The Governor is to receive an annual salary of $2,500; the chief justice and associate justices $2,500; and the secretary $2,000, which salaries are to be paid quarterly from the dates of the respective appointments, at the Treasury of the United States; but no payment is to be made until they shall have entered upon the duties of their respective appointments, or for any period of time during which they may be, respectively, absent from the Territory. The members of the Legislative Assembly are to be entitled to receive four dollars each per day during their attendance at the sessions thereof, and four dollars each for every twenty miles travel in going to and returning from the sessions, estimated according to the nearest usually traveled routes; and an allowance of eight dollars per day is to be paid to the presiding officer of the Legislative Council for each day he shall so preside. A chief clerk, one assistant clerk, one engrossing and one enrolling clerk, a sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper may be chosen for the Council. The chief clerk is to receive four dollars per day, and the other officers three dollars per day, during the session of the Legislative Assembly; but no other officers are to be paid by the United States. There is to be but one session of the Legislative Assembly annually, unless, on an extraordinary occasion, the Governor, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall think proper to call them together. There is to be appropriated annually the usual sum, to be expended by the Governor, to defray the contingent expenses of the Territory, including the salary of the clerk of the executive department; and there is also to be appropriated annually a sufficient sum, to be expended by the secretary of the Territory, and upon an estimate to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses. The Governor and secretary of the Territory, in the disbursement of all moneys intrusted to them, are to be governed solely by the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and shall semi-annually account to him for the manner in which these moneys shall have been expended; but funds intrusted to the Governor, as superintendent of Indian affairs, are to be disbursed and accounted for as provided by law and the rules and regulations of the Interior Department. No expenditure is to be made by the Legislative Assembly for objects not specially authorized by the acts of Congress making the appropriations, nor beyond the sums thus appropriated for such objects.

The Governor and Legislative Assembly are to locate and establish the seat of government for the Territory at such place as they may deem eligible; but the seat of government fixed by the Governor and Legislative Assembly is not to be at any time changed except by an act of the Assembly duly passed and approved, after due notice, by the several Indian tribes, or by a majority of them, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

A Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, who is to be a member of some one of the Indian tribes residing in the Territory and at peace with the United States, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Council, who is to be entitled to the same rights and privileges as are exercised and enjoyed by the Delegates from the several other Territories of the United States to the House of Representatives; but the Delegate first elected is to hold his seat only during the term of the Congress to which he shall be elected; and the first Delegate may be elected by the Legislative Council, and afterward in such manner as may be provided by law. The Constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, are to have the same force and effect within the Indian Territory as elsewhere within the United States.

When the lands in the Territory shall be surveyed under the direction of the Government of the United States, preparatory to bringing them into market, sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township in the Territory are to be reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools in the Territory, and in the States and Territories hereafter to be erected out of it.

Until otherwise provided by law, the Governor of the Territory may assign the judges who may be appointed for the Territory to the several districts, and also appoint the times and places for holding courts in the several subdivisions in each of the judicial districts, by proclamation to be issued by him; but the Legislative Assembly, at their first or any subsequent session, may organize, alter, or modify such judicial districts, and assign the judges, and alter the times and places of holding the courts, as to them shall seem proper and convenient.

All officers to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the Territory, who, by virtue of the provisions of any law now existing, or which may be enacted by Congress, are required to give security for moneys that may be intrusted with them for disbursement, are to give such security at such time and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the bill with various amendments.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the committee, which was in line twenty-six, section one, after the word "States" to strike out the words "after the Indian title shall have been extinguished" and to insert the word "or;" so that the proviso will read:

And provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing said Territory, or changing its boundaries, in such manner and at such time as Congress shall deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of said Territory to any other State or Territory of the United States, with the consent of the Indians residing in said Territory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That word "or" should be stricken out also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That word will be considered as included in the motion to strike out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I think that amendment should include the last sentence. The insertion of the word "or" is certainly wrong. I do not think we ought to ask the consent of the Indians whether we shall change the boundary of that country or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to that I will say to my friend from Kansas that we specially reserve that the consent of the Indians shall be necessary. We are under treaty obligations with those Indians in relation to this matter which we ought not to depart from, and which we cannot depart from without violating the faith of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY. But by the text of the bill, as it is printed, the word "or" is printed as an amendment of the committee.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That has been stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. If the word "or" is stricken out that makes good grammar of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That was a misprint, and I have moved to strike it out.

The next amendment was in section three, line two, after the word "Territory" to insert the words "appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the section will read:

That there shall be a secretary of said Territory, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside therein, and hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose to add an amendment at the end of the fifth section. I move to insert the words "and approved by Congress" after the words "Legislative Council;" so that the clause will read:

But the qualifications of voters, and of members of said Council, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Council and approved by Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was in section six, line nine, to strike out the word "forcible" and insert the word "compulsory;" so that the clause will read:

But no law shall be in force providing for the sale, taxation, or incumbrance of real estate, or the compulsory collection of debts, until approved by Congress, nor shall any be imposed upon the property of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is one of the important provisions of the bill, and I will simply state that the reason why that provision was inserted was because such are the laws of the Indian tribes in those Territories now. They have no law to enforce the collection of debt, and it is deemed entirely improper that among Indians in their present state such a law should exist.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section seven, line fifty-five, to strike out the words "and enforce" after the word "recognize," and in line fifty-six to strike out the words "lawfully residing in said Territory," and to insert "as to the members and within the limits of the same;" so that the clause will read:

The said supreme court and circuit courts shall recognize all laws, rules, and usages of each of said Indian tribes, as to the members and within the limits of the same, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the Legislative Council.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line two, after the word "appointed" to insert the words "by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the clause will read:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an attorney for said Territory, who shall continue in office four years, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line nine, after the word "appointed" to insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the clause will read:

There shall also be a marshal for the Territory appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall hold his office for four years, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line nineteen, after the word "dollars" to insert "and the further sum of $500 as superintendent of Indian affairs;" so that the clause will read:

The Governor shall receive an annual salary of $2,500, and the further sum of $500 as superintendent of Indian affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line thirty-one, after the word "Legislative" to strike out the word "Assembly" and to insert the word "Council."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The committee propose that same amendment, striking out "Assembly" and inserting "Council" in a great many places in the section, and I suggest that the question be taken on them all together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) All those amendments throughout the bill will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. After the words "duly passed" in the seventh line of section ten I move to insert the words "and approved by the Governor;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the seat of government fixed by the Governor and Legislative Council shall not be at any time changed except by an act of the said Council duly passed, and approved by the Governor, and which shall be approved, after due notice, by the several Indian tribes, or by a majority of them, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section twelve, line one, to strike out the word "when" and to insert "whenever with the consent of the said Indian tribes;" so that it will read:

That whenever with the consent of the said Indian tribes the lands in the said Territory shall be surveyed under the direction of the Government of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In section thirteen, line seven, after the word "Council" I move to insert "with the approval of the Governor;" so that it will read:

But the Legislative Council, with the approval of the Governor, at their first or any subsequent session may organize, alter, or modify such judicial districts, and assign the judges, and alter the times and places of holding the courts as to them shall seem proper and convenient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not want to interpose any objection to this measure if it be the pleasure of the Senate to adopt it, but it is very new in its character, and it seems to me the attention of the Senate to some little extent ought to be given to it. This is a proposition coming from the Committee on Indian Affairs, not having been considered, I believe, by the Committee on Territories, to organize a new Territory, with all the machinery applicable to a territorial government, with two peculiarities not found, I believe, in any other territorial organization: first, that there shall be a Legislature to be selected from among the Indians themselves to legislate upon all questions of a domestic character; and in the second place, that there shall be a Delegate to Congress selected by the Indians. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the bill. I hardly know whether I am in favor of it or against it; I am not prepared to vote for it without some consideration. It is a bill that was introduced by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARKLAW,] I observe, three days ago, on the 20th of this month, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and reported by that committee yesterday, and laid upon my desks to-day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the honorable Senator that several weeks ago a resolution of the Senate directed the committee to inquire into the propriety of this measure, and the matter has been the subject of consideration for some considerable time in the committee, although in the form of a bill it did not appear until the Senator from Iowa reduced it to form and had it referred to a committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs what tribes it is contemplated to collect upon this reservation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This Indian Territory is very peculiar from all the other Territories of the United States. It belongs in fee simple as it stands, by patent from the United States, to the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Seminoles, the Choctaws, and the Chickasaws. They own the fee simple derived from the United States by a patent, and those tribes in that Territory, previous to this rebellion, had advanced to such a degree of civilization that they were capable of self-government, and maintaining a government. They had their written constitutions, their written laws, their courts, their treasurers, and other officers, &c. The rebellion, it is true, involved some of those tribes in the rebellion against the United States, and in this Territory there have been terrible conflicts, and wars, and anarchy, and confusion. The committee, after full consideration, have deemed that the best form in which to get at this Territory, and get it into some shape, and bring some kind of order out of this chaos and anarchy, was to provide by some law of Congress for some mode by which these Indians themselves could be brought, with their consent, (because the bill contemplates the consent of these tribes that are at peace with the United States,) into a measure of this kind, which would authorize them to choose their own legislators or counselors, and by which the United States would be authorized to appoint a Governor, who should at the same time be superintendent of Indian affairs, with the power of an absolute veto upon the proceedings of the councils, which was believed to be necessary in the present state of affairs. It is believed something of this kind is the best mode in which to reorganize that Territory, and bring peace, and order out of chaos and confusion.

Mr. RAMSEY. This is somewhat a question of geography, and I should like to understand from the chairman whether it is calculated to bring the northern tribes down into the country south of the southern line of Kansas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is nothing—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor, and all this debate is out of order except with his consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not object to the Senator from Wisconsin making any explanation in answer to the question of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is nothing in this bill on that subject, but I will state frankly to the honorable Senator from Minnesota that there has been a hope entertained by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, and I believe by the Department, that the more civilized portions of our Indian tribes might be induced, not forced, but by some treaty arrangements made be induced, to go and join their fortunes with the Indians in this Territory, and better their condition and advance in civilization. That is the hope, although there is nothing in this bill which provides for that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The fourth section of the bill provides for the selection of the Legislative Council. It does not require that the members of the Legislative Council shall be Indians, but that they shall be selected for the Indians; that is, there shall be "one member for each one thousand Indians or a fraction of a thousand greater than five hundred." The person selected may be an Indian, or he may be a white man. He is to be selected by the Indians, or the members of the tribe, (and I believe that white persons may become members of the tribe,) by the persons who are defined as voters in this section. If there is no election, then the head of the tribe is to be the legislator for that tribe. When that mixed Legislation, then, part Indian and part white, meet, they will have jurisdiction by the sixth section to legislate upon—

All rightful subjects and matters pertaining to the intercourse of the Indian tribes in said Territory, and the administration of internal justice—and the administration of internal justice and the punishment of crimes; and the civilization and improvement of the people, consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and provisions of this act; but no law shall be in force providing for the sale, taxation, or incumbrance of real estate, or the compulsory collection of debts, until approved by Congress; nor shall any tax be made upon the property of the United States; and no law, rule, or regulation adopted by said council shall take effect and be in force until it has received the approval of the Governor.

This is very comprehensive language—

I desire Senators to observe that all legislative power in respect to the Indians and in respect to all other persons in this Territory is conferred upon this Legislative Council, selected in the manner in which I have suggested; but no laws upon certain subjects, that is, for the "sale, taxation, or incumbrance of real estate or the compulsory collection of debts shall be in force until approved by Congress." I take it that all other laws upon all other subjects that can affect the Indians are to be in force without the approval of Congress; so that by the passage of this bill Congress surrenders to this Legislative Council the right to legislate for the Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to that, perhaps there is some force in the objection of the Senator from Indiana. I do not know that I have any objection to make the approval of Congress essential to the validity of all laws passed by the Council. That was the form of the early territorial governments. All laws were required to be submitted to Congress, and we approved them before they took effect; and it is possible, as the Senator suggests, that it would be wiser to require all the laws of this Council to be submitted to Congress. I should not object to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that in the acts passed recently for the organization of territorial governments, the right of Congress to say whether the territorial laws shall be in force or not is not found except in respect to Utah. I believe that Congress must approve the laws of the Territorial Legislature of Utah; but with that exception, I believe it is not found anywhere in any of the Territories. But I would not consider that of much importance. I have never known the laws of any Territorial Legislature to receive the careful consideration of Congress. They are not referred to any committee of the body, I believe, with a view to their careful examination, and the power that is reserved to Congress to review these laws is really of little value. Therefore, in substance, Congress, by the passage of this bill will surrender to an Indian Council the power to make all laws governing the intercourse of the Indians and the intercourse of white persons with the Indians in the Territory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me to interrupt him, we have already by treaty surrendered to the Indian tribes in that Territory the soil and the jurisdiction, and the whole power of legislation over all persons coming within the jurisdiction of the tribes. That is our treaty arrangement with them now. By an express provision and by a patent we have given them the land in fee simple; and prior to the rebellion they had regularly-organized governments. The confusion and terrible anarchy which have grown up there since the rebellion broke out have thrown many of these Indians as refugees on our hands, whom we have had to send back and keep there by military protection, and a necessity has been thrown upon us to do something for the Indians in this Territory. The proposition we make is, that, in our action, so far as the loyal Indians friendly to the United States are concerned, we act with their consent, and not against their consent or wish.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, when this war commenced there were sixty-five thousand Indians in this Indian Territory, each tribe having a separate and independent government, divided into counties. By the war we have had thrown upon our hands about eighteen thousand out of the sixty-five thousand. The balance have gone over to the traitors. There are eighteen thousand refugees who are left in that Territory entirely unprotected, and who are being maintained by the Government at an expense of a million and a half a year, perhaps two million a year. There is no subject that can come before the Senate in which the people I represent feel more interest than this; and I suggest to the Senator from Indiana, when he is discussing this as a new bill, to remember that the Indian tribes in this Indian Territory are largely advanced in civilization, and a very large proportion of them are white men, half breeds, three fourths and seven eighths. I presume three fourths of the entire body of these Indians are three fourths white blood, as intelligent as any people that we have; and as well educated. The Indian regiments now in our service are commanded to a considerable extent by Indian officers, as intelligent as our own officers; and the people there are far advanced in civilization beyond any other Indians on the continent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am rather gratified to be interrupted by the chairman of the committee and by the Senator from Kansas, who are presumed to be very conversant with the subject the Senate is now considering. My purpose was mainly to call out some information upon this bill, and to call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. Now I understand the Senator from Wisconsin, who has reported this bill, to say that by treaty we have already surrendered to the tribes separately the power of legislation touching their own tribal affairs; but I presume those treaties do not confer upon the tribes the power to legislate in respect to the intercourse of every body else with the tribes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Within their jurisdiction it does. That is the treaty.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I take it if there be such provisions in the treaties, before we can take away from any one tribe the power to legislate exclusively for itself and to confer it upon a council representing the different tribes, we must obtain the consent of each particular tribe.

Mr. HARLAN. That is contemplated by this bill. It provides distinctly that their rights shall not be interfered with until they consent to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Can a treaty be modified by a mere assent of the tribes? How is that assent to be given? What evidence are we to have of the fact? A treaty is a very solemn compact between the Government and the tribe. Now this proposition is, by ordinary law, to allow the provisions of the treaty to be materially modified simply by the assent of the tribe. Does the Senator desire that? I am not going to discuss this other provision which gives to the Indians the right to be represented in the House of Representatives. If the House of Representatives should be satisfied with that, of course, as a Senator, I do not choose to interpose any particular objection to it. Nor do I know but what, after a very careful examination of this bill, I might be in favor of it; but it is a very important modification of the policy of the Government toward the Indian tribes; and I think that to introduce a bill on the 20th, to report it on the 22d, to lay it upon our table to-day, and pass it, is rather hasty legislation in respect to so grave and important a national question.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, before proceeding further with this bill, what tribes it is contemplated to bring within this reservation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The tribes now occupying that Territory are the Cherokees, who occupy all between Kansas and the Arkansas river; the Creeks, who occupy south of the Arkansas and north of the Canadian; the Seminoles, who occupy between the Canadian, I think, and the south fork of the Canadian; and then the Choctaws occupy south of the Canadian, the southwest portion of this Territory; and the Chickasaws occupy south of the Canadian, about the middle portion; and the Wachitas, or the affiliated tribes that were brought in from Texas, occupy the western portion of the Territory which lies south of the Canadian.

In relation to the tribes that it is supposed may be induced by treaty to go into the Territory and unite their fortunes with these other tribes, that is to be a matter of arrangement by treaty with the other friendly tribes. It has sometimes been expected that the Delawares might go there, and the civilized tribes of Kansas, Nebraska, and perhaps as far north as Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota; but the latter may never think of going there, it is true. The climate is very different, and the habits of the Minnesota Indians are different; they live on the rice lakes, and on the game which abounds in those rice lakes, and the fish of those lakes; their habits are very different from the habits of the Indians further south, and they may never desire to go there.

I do not understand that there is to be any attempt to force these Indians to go there, nor does this bill of itself or anything contained in it of necessity contemplate the removal of any other Indian tribes to the Territory. But it is a very fine Territory; it is as fine a section of country as there is in the United States, and perhaps as fine as the sun ever shone upon, and before this war broke out the Indian tribes there were increasing in population, they were increasing in wealth, they were increasing in flocks of cattle and horses, I believe beyond any equal number of persons in the whole United States. It is a country where flocks and herds grow, as it were, almost spontaneously; they require no labor to winter them; and it is a truth that the armies of the rebels, the armies of the United States, and the conflicting and fighting Indians have lived upon the cattle that were found and are still to be found in that Indian Territory. By hundreds and by thousands they are still there. It is a very productive Territory. It is the country that the Government long, long ago, under the policy of General Jackson, solemnly set apart for the Indians, and it belongs to them. The only thing involved in the bill is this: we could by strict right forfeit the title of those Indians who have rebelled against the United States if we chose to do so; but when the war is over the Indians will still be upon our hands, as they must be provided for somehow, and perhaps it is better that we should begin an organization over this Territory, get the consent of the Indians to it, and perhaps this may be used as one of the instrumentalities to induce the Choctaws and Chickasaws who have been in rebellion against us to come into this arrangement when they find that they can take part in the legislation of this very Territory if they lay down their arms against the Government. But these are rather speculations than otherwise.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator if he does not in this provide that before they can do that they have got to swear that they will have nothing to do with the rebellion.

Mr. HARLAN. No; that provision is in relation to office holders in the Territory only.

Mr. POMEROY. I would not like to put any obstacle in the way of the passage of this bill. Still, it is a new measure, and there are some features of it that do not seem to me altogether proper. I sympathize somewhat with the Senator from Indiana; and I should like a little more time to consider it. There are three things that I think somewhat essential which are not provided for. In the first place, this sets out to be a temporary government; yet it is provided that it shall be permanent for all time to come. Secondly, it sets out to be an Indian Territory, and yet no provision is made against white people going in and actually being adopted as members of the tribes and absorbing the Government of the country; and as if to offer an inducement for that, there is a direct provision made that there shall be no forcible legal collection of debts inside this Territory. That is a new feature.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator will allow me to interrupt him. That is one of the distinguishing features of the laws of these Indian tribes, the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles; all of them by their laws provided that there should be no compulsory collection of debts, because in a state of society not fully civilized it would be a dangerous power to be exercised if Indians could be permitted to contract debts and have those debts enforced against them; and we provide that there shall be no sale of lands.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object to a law that would prevent the enforcement of the collection of debts against Indians; but this bill is so drawn and the existing usage is such that the Indians are to be absorbed. My colleague very well says they are bleaching out now; they are becoming white men.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On a point suggested by my colleague I should like to ask him a question. Does he not know that a large number of black persons have intermarried with Indians of these tribes and become members of the tribes? Does he object to the provision of the bill which permits black people to continue to go in and become members of the tribes?

Mr. POMEROY. I understand that negroes and Indians have intermarried. I do not object to it. That is not the point. My colleague stated what I think is true, that these tribes are becoming white persons to a great extent, and there is no provision in the bill against white people taking possession of this country and this Government. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is suggested to me that my last remark may lead to a misapprehension. These tribes are composed of an amalgamation of the whites on the one hand, under the chivalry, while they were in the South, and the blacks on the other hand. The finest specimens of manhood I have ever gazed upon in my life are half-breed Indians crossed with negroes. It is a fact which I state here that while amalgamation with the white man deteriorates both races, the amalgamation of the Indian and the black man advances both races; and so far as I am concerned I should like to see these eighty thousand square miles, almost in the geographical center of the United States, opened up to the Indian and to the black man, and let them amalgamate and build up a race that will be an improvement upon both. I say to anti-slavery men here, if you desire to furnish a home for the black man, pass this territorial bill and let him go there. The climate is genial. He understands how to cultivate the products. They are those of the South, cotton and tobacco. In my opinion nothing can be better calculated to clear the political arena of the question of what shall be done with the black man than to pass this territorial bill, open up this country for him, and he will flock in there and become a useful member of society.

Mr. POMEROY. I will not prolong this discussion, because I have not prepared the amendments which I desire to offer to the bill. I do not wish to make any opposition to the measure, but only to perfect it. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a motion that the further consideration of the bill be postponed with a view to take up the fortification bill. I do not want to act upon it to-night, but I desire to have it left as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let this bill be postponed until to-morrow, and made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to that; I desire to have the fortification bill passed to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the honorable Senator from Ohio to withhold his motion to call up the fortification bill for a few minutes, that I may move to take up two or three little bills which have been reported from the Committee on Pensions that I think we have time to pass to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. I inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the fortification bill will take much time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The bill now before the Senate is of more importance to my constituents than any bill which will come before this body. We have now no protection from the South; this disorganized Territory of eighty-four thousand square miles lies on our border, subjecting us to raids; and I move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow evening at seven o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow evening at seven o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up the fortification bill, so that it may be left as the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1866, was taken up for consideration by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that that bill be laid aside informally for ten minutes—I will not ask for more than ten minutes—to allow a few pension bills to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

THOMAS BOOTLE.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the bill (H. R. No. 454) granting a pension to Thomas Booth was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Thomas Booth on the invalid pension roll of the United States, at the rate of four dollars per month, from the 2d of September, 1858, to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, the first of which was to strike out "Booth" and insert "Bootle."

Mr. FOSTER. That was a verbal error in the engrossment of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "the 2d day of September, 1858," and insert "the 1st day of May, 1860."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by substituting "Bootle" for "Booth."

MARY SHIRCLIFF.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, the bill (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Mary Shircliff, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Mary, widow of John Shircliff, on the pension roll, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars a month during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SISTERS OF COMMODORE MORRIS.

Mr. FOSTER. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 314) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris, and it is the last bill I shall move to take up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Harriet and Emily W. Morris, the unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris, shall be entitled to and receive the same pension as their brother would have been entitled to if he had been totally disabled, to commence from his death; but in case of the death or marriage of either of the sisters, her pension shall cease.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fortification bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, Chaplain to the Senate. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JOHN HASTINGS.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 276) for the relief of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburgh.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be read for information.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in adjusting the accounts of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburgh, to give him credit for $9,956 62, the amount of public moneys of which he was robbed on the 10th

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 65.

of March, 1854, while acting in the aforesaid capacity.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the object be to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims I shall not object.

Mr. HALE. The bill has been before that committee, and they unanimously report in favor of its passage. They reported in favor of it at the last session of Congress. The bill has passed the Senate at three different times, and always failed in the House for want of time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to pass over for the present. I will not object to the bill coming up to-morrow morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business. I have no objection, however, to the bill being referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be postponed until to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. Let it go to the Committee on Claims.

No objection being made, the bill was referred accordingly.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Army appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that for to-day the House take a recess at half past four o'clock till seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering appropriation bills only.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before any change is made in our sessions, I desire to inquire what the regular order of business is. I desire to know particularly with a view of ascertaining whether there is any prospect of carrying out the order of February 2 making the enrollment bill the special order.

The SPEAKER. The first business before the House this morning is the consideration of the bill which was pending when the House adjourned last evening, and which comes up as unfinished business. After that, the morning hour is devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on the District of Columbia, after that the remainder of the day, by the assignment of the House, is devoted to reports from the Committee on Commerce, after that the enrollment bill will be next in order.

Mr. STEVENS. The loan bill was postponed till to-day.

The SPEAKER. It was, and so was the enrollment bill. Both are special orders, the enrollment bill having precedence in order of time.

Mr. STEVENS. Such being the condition of things, I move to postpone the loan bill until Monday next, after the morning hour.

There being no objection, the bill was postponed accordingly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now object to making special assignments of anything until we get at this enrollment bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the loan bill is not made a special assignment. It is the postponement of a special order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I remember very well that when we had the enrollment bill as a special order before, the business of the Judiciary Committee, by previous unanimous consent, came before the House and crowded it out; and now, when we should reach it to-day, the Committee on Commerce comes in and shoves it off again. And so it may be next Monday, or any other day.

The SPEAKER. No special assignment after to-day has been made by the House.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I now renew my motion in reference to an evening session. I will state for the information of the House that but one single general appropriation bill has yet passed both Houses. If we can have an evening session, we should probably dispatch a large amount of business. Upon consultation with several members on both sides of the House, I learn that my proposition will be satisfactory.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Does this arrangement extend beyond to-day?

The SPEAKER. For to-day only. The change can be made for this day only by a majority of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CONFISCATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 579) providing for the forfeiture of the fee of rebel landholders, reported last evening from the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] demanded the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the bill been read?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the previous question been sustained?

The SPEAKER. It is now pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Journal clerk informs the Chair that the motion to lay on the table was made last evening, and is still pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I raise the point of order that this House at this session has already passed a bill repealing the section of the law referred to in this bill, and therefore it is not in order to consider it again now.

Mr. ASHLEY. The proposition that passed this House was defeated in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. This point of order has been already raised and overruled. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Noble] raised the same point of order on yesterday, and in vindication of it stated that a section of the Freedman's Bureau bill was the same in effect as this bill. The Chair overruled the point of order, upon the ground that the proposition referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Noble] was but a single section of a bill, while this is an entire and independent bill, and therefore does not come within the rule.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 61, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Chanler, Clay, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, English, Finck, Gauson, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kernan, King, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McAllister, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, Strouse, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Lazarus, Loan, Marey, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Radford, William B. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, William C. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—69.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, a call of the House is not in order unless upon an actual count it is found that there is not a quorum present. The House has just voted by yeas and nays, and there is a quorum present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 54, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—67.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Gauson, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Strouse, Stuart, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Clay, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Lazarus, Loan, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Robinson, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—61.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the final passage of the bill,

Mr. WILSON demanded the previous question.

Mr. COX. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. CHANLER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 68, nays 65, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Gauson, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazarus, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu

B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, and Worthington—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blaine, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Frank, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Loan, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Sweat, Thomas, Ward, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—46.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, and the bill is not laid on the table.

During the roll-call,
Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that Mr. SPALDING was detained at his room by illness.

The result was announced as above stated.
The question then recurred on seconding the call for the previous question.

On the question there were, on a division—ayes 63, noes 62.

Mr. ANCONA called for tellers.
Tellers were ordered.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 67.

So the call for the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion has already been made and voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. There have been intervening questions.

The SPEAKER. There is no change in the status of the bill.

The question being on the final passage of the bill,

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 71, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Goebel, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, S. Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, and Worthington—72.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Hale, Hall, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, LeBlond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blow, William G. Brown, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Farnsworth, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Loan, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Thomas, Ward, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—39.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,
Mr. NOBLE said: My colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, is detained from the House by sickness. If he were here he would vote against the passage of this bill.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to state that if I had been present when my name was called I would have voted in the affirmative on the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the title of the bill so that it will read as follows: An act to repeal a portion of a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862; and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to permit me to make a suggestion in reference to the title.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot yield for that purpose. I have taken the title of the law to which this is amendatory.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 64.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. KERNAN. What was the old title of the bill?

The Clerk read, as follows:

"An act to provide for the forfeiture of the fee of rebel landholders."

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the matter with that title?

Mr. MALLORY. It is pertinent, and exactly indicates the object sought to be accomplished. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 69, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Goebel, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, S. Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, and Worthington—76.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Hale, Hall, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, LeBlond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Townsend, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Blow, William G. Brown, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Farnsworth, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Loan, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Thomas, Ward, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the consideration of Senate bill No. 411, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," on which the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to reply to the objections which were yesterday brought against the proposed amendment to this bill. They came in such a questionable shape that I find only the ghost of an argument to speak to. It is difficult to answer any other than solid objections. We have had only the opinions, prejudices, and vague ideas of men who know nothing definitely on the subject. I presented to the House yesterday a statement of the president of the road, which was a transcript of the books of the company, and that statement was reindorsed by Mr. Darling, a director and a member-elect of this House, as correct, showing that the road does not pay any profits at the present rate of fare. Yet gentlemen told us that that company was amassing wealth at a rapid rate. It is represented to me as a fact that one fourth of the individuals who travel upon the Washington and Georgetown road travel free of charge, on account of the transfer system. The average price of tickets is only three and a half cents each; and at the present value of our currency—that is, its value in gold—that would be equal to about one cent and three quarters in cash. Sir, there is not a road in the country that can carry passengers at that rate, and the testimony is that they are losing upon this road $18,000 a quarter. The roads elsewhere charge above five cents. In Brooklyn they charge eight cents; in Philadelphia, I am told, they charge eight cents; and I learn that there is a proposition before the Legislature of New York to allow all the roads in that State to charge eight cents a ticket. I believe they are charging eight cents a ticket on the roads in and about Boston. I have been so informed.

It would therefore seem but just that the price of tickets should be raised on the Washington and Georgetown railroad. Why, sir, I am told this morning, on good authority, that the stock of the Washington and Georgetown road has been offered in the market at the original cost to the present stockholders, but found no purchasers at that price.

But the objection is made that this company does not allow colored people to ride in their cars, and that they have been ejected from them. It may be true that this has been done in some instances, but to my personal knowledge conductors so ejecting colored people have been discharged when the facts were brought to the notice of the president of the road.

It is alleged that the committee propose, by an amendment to the Senate bill, to continue this evil. Now, sir, I submit that the amendment under discussion ought not to suffer from views which gentlemen may entertain in respect to other parts of the report. I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] upon the propriety of allowing black people to ride in the same cars and on equal terms with white people.

I may vote with him when we reach the resolution proposed by the committee on that point, but let us not bring that question in here to prejudice this part of the bill. I may be permitted to say, however, that I do not, as a general rule, believe in special legislation for black or for white men. Make them equal before the law, and leave the black men to the blessing of God and their own abilities to take their position in the social world. If the black man is not able to rise to an equality with the white man socially, it will not then be our fault, but his own want of native ability and enterprise which will keep him down. So, as a general rule, I do not believe in special legislation for races or classes. Make them free and give them equal rights under the law, and then leave them to work out their social status and civil history among men. The struggle to rise will develop power, and give position and character. No amount of legislation can ever do this.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire of the gentleman if he means to exclude them from the cars? He does so by not legislating for them.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say that the law does not exclude them, and if they are excluded it is the result of the exercise of a petty, arbitrary authority by some mean conductor; but that authority is not given them by the law. The president of this road, as I am informed, in every such instance that has come to his knowledge, has discharged those conductors who have ejected from the cars black men on account of their color. The blacks have now, before the law, all the rights that the whites have. If they are ejected, let them resort to the law.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the meaning of those boards which are put up over the cars, which say "colored persons admitted in this car."

Mr. PATTERSON. If the gentleman will wait, he will learn my views.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to know what the gentleman's views are, for I know they are all correct; but I want to know what is the meaning of that inscription put up over the cars.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say that what is written on those boards is generally written in good English, and I do not know any gentleman in this House who can better understand and interpret good English than the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Sir, you cannot make one hair white or black by legislation, or make a black man a white man. You may pass a joint resolution that the leopard's spots and the Ethiopian's skin shall be changed, but you will not remove a spot or lighten the hue of the wronged but docile child of the sun. You may vote that the costly gas-light of this Hall is the glory of heaven, but you will find on applying to it a nasal test that it is only a faint glimmer of that light which makes Stygian darkness visible.

Equally vain will it be to attempt to correct social prejudice by special legislation. Differences which are natural will be permanent, differences which result from ages of degradation and outrage can only be removed by the uplifting of other ages of education and social progress. To remove the prejudices of men, even, must be the work of time. Sir, if you adopt the policy of special legislation in favor of the blacks you establish the right of special legislation against them, and I am opposed to that policy.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I rise to a point of order. There is a section of this bill which relates to colored people riding in the cars, but the section under consideration does not, and therefore that this discussion is not applicable to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The pending question is the second section, which relates to the rate of fare.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was only answering objections which have been brought against this section of the bill by the gentlemen who oppose it.

What I say is that legislation will not meet the general difficulties which we all feel. Still there may be some abuses practiced by conductors on this road which render it absolutely necessary in this particular case to curtail their power by legislation. But whatever are the abuses on this subject, it is hardly fair to bring in our prejudices to bear upon the amendment before the House, which proposes to increase the price of tickets on the street railroads of the city.

But in order to meet objections upon this point, I wish to modify the amendment proposed by the committee, so as to make the fares on both roads "seven" cents, instead of "eight;" and to add thereto the proviso which I send to the desk. If it is in order I would be glad to offer them both at the same time.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Do I understand that these amendments are authorized to be reported by the committee?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company and the Metropolitan Railroad Company shall have the right to charge seven cents fare: Provided, That after two years from and after the passage of this act only the original fare of five cents as authorized by the charters of the two companies named in this act shall be charged.

Mr. PATTERSON. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope it will not be seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is an amendment and an amendment to the amendment now pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I wish to comment on the amendment and to show what amendment I would offer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire withdraw the demand for the previous question or insist upon it?

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I appeal to my colleague upon the Committee for the District of Columbia to yield to me for a moment before he calls the previous question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will yield to the gentleman if he will call the previous question when he is through.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to call it after I get through. Before proceeding, however, I will yield to my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] who desires to make some reports that will give rise to no discussion.

CHANGE OF NAME.

Mr. DUMONT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 439, to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it in order to move to strike out one of the remaining names?

The SPEAKER. The bill has passed the point where it can be amended.

The bill was passed.

Mr. DUMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXES IN GEORGETOWN.

Mr. DUMONT also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 393, to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. DUMONT also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the Senate No. 167, to incorporate an insurance company in the city of Washington. The bill was laid on the table.

NATIONAL PROTECTION INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. DUMONT also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the Senate No. 386, to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was laid on the table.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 764, to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company in the city of Washington.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GANSON. I want to know if there is any provision in that bill allowing colored persons to put up at this hotel. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want everything equal. The fare in all the hotels now in this city is limited, and I want the fare limited in this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I want, as a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, to offer an amendment providing that this company shall make no distinction of color in the reception of their guests. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent, the bill having been read the third time. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I object. They can provide for that in the by-laws of the corporation.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken, and the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider; and being put, the motion was rejected—ayes 44, noes 48.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. PATTERSON. I cannot yield the floor any longer. I call the previous question on the pending amendment to the railroad bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. TRACY. I hope my colleague on the District Committee will not call the previous question on this bill at this stage. If he does, I hope the House will vote it down.

The question was taken; and the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe there is an amendment to the amendment now pending. I send to the Chair an amendment which I propose to offer when an opportunity shall be presented, and I do it with a view of submitting a remark or two on the amendment itself. I ask to have it read for information.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Provided, That neither of the railroad companies named in this bill shall be permitted to charge or collect a fare from any passenger conveyed on either of such railroads without furnishing a seat to such passenger.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the American people are, perhaps, the most patient in the world in the manner in which they permit corporations to treat them.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a question of order. Is the amendment which has been read before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then I insist that the gentleman shall confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. For the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois, I will repeat as nearly as I can the sentence which I had commenced. I say that I think the American people are perhaps the most patient in the world as regards their submission to the demands of corporations. I believe there is no country in which common carriers, being authorized or licensed by law or otherwise to perform certain duties for the mutual benefit of themselves in the shape of profits, and of the public in the shape of conveyance furnished, are permitted to give that conveyance or not as may suit their objects, without much reference to the public, as in this country. Now, everywhere else except in the United States public corporations proposing to carry passengers supply facilities for the conveyance of such passengers. It is not so here, and as little so in the case of these particular railroads as any others in the country. I hold that what we authorize this Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company and Metropolitan Railroad Company to do is to carry on the business of common carriers. If they are common carriers, then I do not see any difficulty in this question, which has occasioned, as I think, such unnecessary excitement about the distinction between blacks and whites. I suppose that everybody who civilly and respectfully applies either to have his goods conveyed, if that be the object of the association, or to have his person carried, if that be the business engaged in, has a right to have his freight or his person transported by any one authorized to act as a common carrier. In the same way he has the right to expect that this common carrier shall furnish to him all the ordinary and usual facilities and accommodations to make that transportation comfortable to him. I have no objection to the amount of business that these railroads do. I am glad to see them prosper. I am glad to see that the directors or stockholders in this company, whether in New York or Washington, whether in the Senate or House of Representatives, are getting due profits on their stock.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to say one word in reference to a remark which I heard yesterday, intimating that I was a stockholder in this company.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never dreamed of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to say that I never owned, and never expect to own, one dollar of stock in the road. I never gave a vote in this House on any measure in which I had any interest whatever other than as a common citizen of the United States. If I ever have occasion to vote, under any such circumstances, I will announce my interest to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very glad that the gentleman from New York should have been afforded this opportunity to make his disclaimer, if he thought it necessary to do so. I do not know who made the imputation he refers to. I never dreamed of it. I think his integrity and purity of character is such as to be at once an answer to any suspicion that he is interested in this company. I do not know, and I do not care, whether anybody in or out of Washington, or anybody in or out of Congress, comes within the category of stockholders. But I say that, whosoever they may be—and I have heard that the interest is pretty widely diffused, and is not confined to Washington or to officials, but is to be found in other cities—I am glad they should make profit, and I am glad that the public at large should be accommodated. What I say is, that while they are thus authorized, as common carriers, to have exclusive privileges, and to a certain extent a monopoly, for the accommodation of the public, they should be held bound on their part to furnish all those accommodations that may be reasonably expected. When, therefore, an opportunity is afforded to amend the bill further, I propose to offer the amendment which I have had read for information. The only effect of it will be not to break down this company, not to injure its business, but to require it to increase the number of its cars and to run them more frequently, so that all the public may be accommodated; and, my word for it, there will be seats found when seats only are to be paid for. There will be cars enough, and they will run frequently enough, because personal interest will stimulate the company, when one of the conditions of its charter is that every individual who seeks conveyance by these cars shall have a seat.

In reference to the general proposition to increase the fare, I am opposed to it; and I am opposed to it on this general fact. Sympathy is attempted to be got up here in behalf of this company, and a bill for its relief is introduced, because owing to the troubles in the country, and the greatly enhanced price of everything, they cannot run their cars at anything like the same cost that they could run them at before the war. That is true of pretty much all the business of the country. But then there is another side to this. If it costs them two or three times as much for materials, for their rolling stock, and for feed for their horses, they do five, six, or seven times as much business in consequence of the war as they could do before it. We see this illustrated in all the business of life. Your salaried men, your men whose incomes neither expand nor contract, because they always receive so much and no more, are suffering in this matter. But it is not true in reference to those who engage in trade or business of any kind; for they find their business expanded quite in proportion to, and generally beyond, the expansion of the currency. Your people who are merchants, who are mechanics, who are manufacturers, who are railroad men, who are carrying cars along Pennsylvania avenue here, are not like the clerks in your offices, or like the soldiers and officers in your armies.

Mr. HOLMAN. Or like members of Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. Or like members of Congress, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says, who have the same duties to perform, whether they perform them well or ill; all receive the same pay, no matter what are the changes of the times, no matter what the depreciation of the currency, or what the inflation of the prices. It is not so with any of these people; and I repeat the general proposition, that if we undertake to relieve people in one case we must relieve them all over the land. I am not talking about anything that is at all abstruse; I am not talking about anything that is not familiar to the whole thinking public of this country; and I think it is enough to meet demands of this sort with the general proposition, that these people no more need relief on account of the inflation of prices and the cost of carrying on their business than do our merchants, manufacturers, and traders all over the land. They do not need it, for the reason that they are not like salaried men with fixed incomes which do not expand with the expansion of the currency; and the traders, manufacturers, merchants, and railroad men do not need it, because their incomes expand as prices are inflated. And just in proportion as the currency increases, it gives these companies a great deal more with which to get feed for their horses, to build their cars, buy their rolling stock, and do all their business, which is stimulated by the increase of prices all over the country. And that enables them to carry, and they have the opportunity to carry, for instance, in Washington, five, seven, ten, and I am not certain but twenty passengers now, where they would have carried but one if it were not that the war had crowded this city with soldiers and citizens from all parts of the country.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if the prices of all kinds of merchandise of which he speaks are fixed by law, or if they have not been increased as the war has progressed.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. And so far as that goes it is an argument, but not an argument against the fact; and having answered the question of the gentleman, I will retort by asking him if these railroads do not carry from ten to twenty passengers now, in consequence of the crowded condition of the city, where they carried but one before the war?

Mr. PATTERSON. I will answer that question by saying that if they do they lose on every passenger they carry; and the more they carry the greater is the amount they lose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot believe that the stock of that company would sell at par if that was so. If they were losing on every passenger they carried their stock would be sold at a great depreciation. Indeed, it is admitted that the stock is not depreciated, that it is worth at least all these gentlemen paid for it at second-hand. That much has been admitted by the gentleman this morning. I have seen no indication that this company is losing from day to day, losing on every passenger they carry.

This bill contemplates increasing the fare not only on the Washington and Georgetown railroad, but on the Metropolitan railroad. Now, let me say in regard to the Metropolitan Railroad Company, that, so far as comfort and convenience are concerned, every one must regret that they do not appear to be doing anything like the same smashing business that their brethren on the avenue between the navy-yard and Georgetown seem to be doing. That is perhaps in part owing to their line not having the same length, and those who wish to go all the way to Georgetown or all the way to the navy-yard are necessarily thrown upon the other line of road. It may be owing to other causes. But, however that may be, the proposition embraces increase of fare to both the Metropolitan Railroad Company and the other.

Now, when was that Metropolitan Railroad Company chartered? Since this war commenced—only a few months ago—with gold then bearing a greater disproportion to the paper currency of the country than it does even to-day. And yet now, with gold going down, with prices certainly not greater than then, we are called upon to make a change in the fare to be charged upon that road. Why, sir, either there was a very great mistake in this company's then accepting the conditions of the grant, or else there is a very great mistake in supposing that now, after the lapse of merely a few weeks, when circumstances are at least not worse than they were, this company need the relief which is proposed.

I do not wish either of these companies, or any company that furnishes conveniences, as these do to a very great degree, to the public, to lose by what they undertake. But I shall not believe that they are thus suffering and thus losing until I see some further indications of it than we have had as yet. On the other hand, looking upon these railroad cars as being, in the fullest sense of the term, the people's carriages, the poor man's means of conveyance, I would aid them in increasing their business by multiplying to the greatest possible extent the number whom they are permitted and whom they are enabled to accommodate; but, unless some very good and clear reason be shown to the contrary, I would keep the prices down to the minimum amount, in order that the mass of the people of the country maybe accommodated through the means of these conveyances afforded for the general benefit and the general comfort.

These are the reasons why I cannot vote for increasing these rates of fare. In no fact presented here do I see anything to show that they are doing a losing business. On the other hand, I would gladly see imposed upon them such restrictions that, like other common carriers, they should be required to furnish, as an equivalent for the monopoly given to them by their charter, all the facilities and accommodations that they ought to give to those who are conveyed by them.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west; and

An act (H. R. No. 184) to create the eastern judicial district of the State of New York.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. Nicolay, his Private Secretary, announced that he had this day approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian titles to land in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City, and State of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said State; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, asked and obtained leave of absence from this evening's session.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. TRACY. If it be in order, I propose to offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that no further amendment is now in order.

Mr. TRACY. I do not offer this as an amendment to an amendment, but as a substitute for the bill as reported from the committee and the pending amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TRACY] will be read for information. Perhaps it may be adopted by unanimous consent.

The proposed substitute was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, after hearing this proposition read, understands the intent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is, after the bill shall be perfected in its present form, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the substitute which he proposes. That will be in order hereafter. This is a Senate bill, to which the Committee for the District of Columbia recommend various amendments. Those amendments must be acted on first. After the bill has been perfected as far as possible by amendments this substitute will be in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that in this Congress a bill was reported to amend the charter of this Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company. That bill, as introduced, instead of increasing the fare, provided for reducing it to three cents; and I have been advised that if Congress would give a charter to another company to put down a track between the Capitol and the Treasury building, they will bind themselves to carry passengers for three cents. The Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company found fault with this proposed decrease of fare, yet they did not ask that the fare might be increased. But that bill contained other provisions to which the company did not object, and which gentlemen do not now propose to incorporate in this bill along with this increase of fare. For instance, it was provided in that bill that the company should run their cars at given intervals of time and at given rates of speed, so that the cars would not be so much crowded. It was further provided that the company should keep in order the tracks, and should clean the flagging, which it was believed to be right and fair that they should do, so that persons desiring to get on or off the cars would not have to wade ankle-deep in mud, as they now do. And all these things which bear upon the company are not to be touched at all by this increase; they are to be left out entirely. As I said yesterday, we are called upon to increase this fare to eight cents, and to impose upon the laboring men and women of this District, the clerks of the various Departments, marketmen, soldiers, and our constituents who may be here and use these cars, an additional tax, and to put additional money into the already gorged pockets of this company.

The gentleman seems to think that this is an abused corporation. Why, gentlemen will recollect when this bill was passed the tremendous scramble to get stock between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. I believe there was no less than $10,000,000 subscribed, out of which the stock had to be taken, so greedy were the people to get the stock. And well they might be. I recollect that the gentleman from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, well acquainted with these things, said that the franchise as it was passed was worth $500,000. I believed that it was worth $1,000,000. And, Mr. Speaker, I do protest against raising this fare for the benefit of this corporation. I protest against it in behalf of the people.

I am not satisfied with the statements made in regard to the profits of this road when I see the cars going eighteen hours every day and filled all the time. I cannot be made to believe that this is a losing business. I undertake to say that no considerable amount of stock in the hands of present holders can be bought at anything like a reasonable premium. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] professes to have better information. I was told on authority believed to be good that the original stock which only cost, or on which there was only paid in, twenty dollars, is worth $400. The gentleman from New York says that that is not so. Perhaps he knows better than I do. I was told by what I understood to be good authority.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The gentleman said yesterday that that information had been furnished to him by a director of the company.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. On the authority of the president of the company, I pronounce the statement in reference to the stock to be untrue. The stock was never sold for any such sum. It can be proved that it was never worth any such sum.

Mr. DAWES. Tell us the exact difference between what the stock cost and what it can be now bought for.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I will tell the gentleman exactly: the last sale of that stock, which is in shares of fifty dollars, was for $67.50.

Mr. DAWES. What I want to know is, how much was paid in.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I will state that the original capital was $500,000, and I understand that forty or fifty per cent. was paid in. The bonds of the company were given for the construction of the road.

Mr. Speaker, I have always admired the exemplary and Christian spirit with which my friend from Illinois resigns himself to the misfortunes of other people when nothing comes from his pockets or the pockets of the people of Illinois. He is ready to make the appropriation when his constituents are affected. He has an intense love for the great people, and corporations must take nothing from them even though the corporations are losing by the business they are doing.

What I said yesterday is true. This company is losing money on the business they are doing, and the road will not be able to continue running unless this relief is extended by Congress. Sir, the free list of this company, the passengers they carry over the road without charge of one cent, amount to one thousand passengers per day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know what this free list is?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Senators, members of the House, clerks, and other persons.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have never seen anybody but our honorable selves exhibiting passes.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I have a great many times. Perhaps the gentleman does not ride on the road as frequently as he would if he had not had a quarrel with the company.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ride whenever I desire. I never had any quarrel with them. My friend from New York is entirely mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I am happy to hear it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The company owe me nothing, and I owe them nothing. They afford me tolerably good accommodations, and I pay them for it.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. This bill was introduced, and I have advocated it upon the ground of justice, and justice alone. I do not desire to put money inordinately into the pockets of this company or that of any other. This bill was introduced for the purpose of relieving the Metropolitan Railroad Company, a company having a line two miles long, upon which they were permitted to charge a fare of only five cents. The fact has been stated here, and I believe truly, that upon their business now they are losing more than two hundred dollars a day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then according to this statement of my friend the object of our charging every passenger who shall ride upon the Washington and Georgetown railroad three cents in addition to the present fare is not for the benefit of that company but for the benefit of the Metropolitan Railroad Company. So that when we ride on the Washington and Georgetown road and pay an additional three cents it is not for their benefit but for the benefit of the other company.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The gentleman misunderstood the position I took. I was merely stating the history of this transaction, and saying that the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company had nothing to do with the purposes for which this bill was introduced. They knew nothing of the matter, but when they saw this bill for the relief of the Metropolitan Railroad Company the president of the other company saw at once that the right to increase the fare on the Metropolitan railroad to eight cents would not inure to their benefit unless the fare of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company was raised also.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (interrupting.) Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has, and the remainder of the day is assigned to the business of the Committee on Commerce.

MACKEREL FISHERIES.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill to extend the provisions of the first section of the act for the government of persons in certain fisheries, approved June 19, 1813; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the first section of the act for the government of persons in certain fisheries, approved June 19, 1813, shall extend to the master or skipper and seamen of vessels of the burden of twenty tons and upward qualified according to the law for carrying on the mackerel fisheries, bound from any port in the United States to be employed in such fisheries, in the same way as if such fisheries had been embraced in said act, provided that the agreement named in said section shall be duly made, indorsed, and countersigned.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts what is the special object of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. It is only to extend certain provisions of the act of 1813 to certain persons engaged in the mackerel fisheries.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand that very well; but I want to know why, at this time, he has introduced this bill to protect those fisheries? What is the necessity for it?

Mr. ELIOT. It is not for protection exactly. I will explain. Since 1790 there have been certain provisions to compel seamen in the merchant marine who desert to return to their vessels. In 1813 the provisions of that act were extended to the cod fisheries. At that time the mackerel fisheries had not been fairly established. It has been found lately, and especially since the commencement of this war, that there is great difficulty in compelling the services of mariners who had engaged to serve in the mackerel fisheries, because the laws of 1813 do not extend to them. The object of this law is simply to extend the provisions of the law of 1813 to that class.

Mr. CHANLER. Are they in the service of the United States?

Mr. ELIOT. Not at all.

Mr. CHANLER. The service to which the gentleman alludes is not very clear to me. In what service are those men?

Mr. ELIOT. The mackerel service only.

Mr. CHANLER. I represent to a certain extent what is called Mackerelville, and I feel very much interested in knowing how far the provisions of this act would touch my constituents. But at the same time I consider that the provisions of this bill do protect the mackerel service and give to the men in that service a protection whereby they are induced to remain in that service rather than go into any other. Am I not correct in that supposition?

Mr. ELIOT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he belongs to the mackerel brigade, and desires to know whether the provisions of this bill will protect him? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken. He is the exponent of the codfish aristocracy, [laughter,] and my object in addressing him was to irritate his dorsal fin. He has been here for some time cutting capers with regard to the fisheries, and putting hooks into the mouths of this House and drawing them hither and thither.

Now, I am of the opinion that the gentleman is indeed an admirable fisherman and admirable representative of the codfish aristocracy. But it is not necessary to include me in the mackerel brigade, for I do not bear any of those fins which characterize him individually. At the same time, I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me, or to throw ridicule upon an honest effort on the part of this side of the House to bring before this body the provisions of a bill which is being passed without consideration.

If the bill is a good one, I have no objection to it. My question was put in good faith, and if the gentleman wishes he can answer it. It is a plain question. I wish to know whether this bill does not protect a certain business and source of profit. I believe it does. If it does not, the gentleman can say so.

Mr. ELIOT. When the gentleman gets through I will answer him.

Mr. CHANLER. I am through.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman inquires whether this bill protects the interests of a certain fishery. It does not in one sense and it does in another.

Mr. CHANLER. Exactly.

Mr. ELIOT. It extends to that fishery the same privileges and rights and imposes upon it the same burdens as the law now extends to the mercantile marine and to all the other fisheries. Now, is the gentleman answered?

Mr. CHANLER. I am satisfied, and I rose to ask the question in order that the House might understand that very fact. The bill does give certain advantages to a local interest, and the House ought to give it some consideration before they pass it.

Mr. ELIOT. I now call the previous question.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. COX. From a cursory reading of this bill we are not able to understand it. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this bill extends the fishing bounties.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; it has nothing to do with bounties.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to move an additional section to this bill repealing all laws or parts of laws granting fishing bounties?

Mr. ELIOT. That would not be germane to this bill.

Mr. COX. It would be American.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I consented to the reporting of this bill because I do not think there is anything particularly objectionable in it, and nothing that touches the question to which the gentleman from Ohio refers. I hope and believe that my friend from Massachusetts will, at the next session of Congress, bring in a bill to repeal all the bounties allowed to fishermen. I think the time has come when that question can be fully considered, and when these bounties can be repealed. But the proposition is not germane to this bill; and the Committee on Commerce, therefore, did not consider the question of repeal of the fishing bounties in connection with it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the gentleman from Illinois anticipates the action of a future Congress on this subject. I speak earnestly when I say that I believe these bounties should be repealed. It is an outrage on certain sections of the country, as we all know. I do not wish to discuss the question now. I am only sorry that I cannot be in the next Congress to vote with my friend from Illinois for the repeal of the fishing bounties.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, who holds the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the gentleman whether he proposes, in connection with this, to strike down the protection of the lake commerce?

Mr. COX. If I were a member of the next Congress I certainly should do so.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman promised at the last session of Congress that he would do that at this session, but he has not moved in the matter.

Mr. COX. I will try and gratify the gentleman before Congress adjourns.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose you will, after the 4th of March.

Mr. COX. I want the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to get rid of these onerous bounties, and to strike down all these monopolizing and protective influences in New England. The great question hereafter to be agitated in the country, now that the negro question is out of the way, is, shall we protect all classes equally? The people of the country are determined—

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to make one remark before he sits down?

Mr. ELIOT. I must resume the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. A single moment—

Mr. ELIOT. I want to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that he will not be in the next Congress, where he might have an opportunity to record his vote on the question of the repeal of the fishing bounties. I have just received a petition which purports to be signed by the owners of the largest fleet engaged in cod fisheries on our coast, asking, in view of the condition of the country, that those bounties which the gentleman from Ohio is so indignant against may be repealed. If the matter had been brought to the attention of the Committee on Commerce at a time when such a measure could have been introduced, with such protection to their rights as is proper, the committee would have been prepared to act on it.

My friend the chairman, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] was right in what he said, that we hope to have an opportunity at next Congress to introduce such a bill; and I trust it will receive the support of the distinguished gentleman who will succeed my friend from Ohio. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under its operation the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS AT NEW YORK.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 729) to amend the act relating to officers employed in the examination of imported merchandise in the district of New York; the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in lieu of the appraisers now authorized by law for the appraisement of goods, wares, and merchandise at the port of New York, the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint for said port one appraiser who shall be practically acquainted with the quality and value of some one or more of the chief articles of importation subject to appraisement, and who,

*before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath faithfully to direct and supervise the examination, inspection, and appraisement according to law, of such goods, wares, and merchandise as the collector may direct, and to cause to be duly reported to the collector the true value thereof, as required by law. And the appraiser, in cases of his necessary and occasional absence, may perform his functions, ad interim, by deputy, designated by him in writing, from the assistant appraisers to be appointed under the provisions of this act.*

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the assistant appraisers now authorized by law for the port of New York, the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint not exceeding nine assistant appraisers for said port, who shall be practically acquainted with the quality and value of some one or more of the chief articles of importation subject to appraisement, and included among the goods, wares, or merchandise, to the examination and appraisement of which they are respectively to be assigned, and who shall be employed in appraising goods, according to law, under the direction and supervision of the appraiser; and each of whom shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe an oath diligently and faithfully to examine and inspect such goods, wares, and merchandise as the appraiser may direct, and truly to report to him the true value thereof according to law; such report to be subject to revision and correction by the appraiser, and when approved by him to be transmitted to the collector, and to be deemed and taken to be the appraisement by the United States local appraiser of the district of such goods, wares, or merchandise required by law.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That one of the assistant appraisers to be appointed by virtue of this act, with special reference to his qualifications for the duties in this section set forth, shall, in addition to the duties that may be required of him by the appraiser, perform the duties and act in the place and stead of the special examiner of drugs, medicines, chemicals, &c., at the port of New York, as provided by the act of June 26, 1848, chapter seventy.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the clerks now employed in the examination, inspection, and appraisement of goods, wares, and merchandise at the port of New York, the Secretary of the Treasury may, on the nomination of the appraiser, appoint such number of examiners as said Secretary may deem necessary, their compensation to be limited and fixed by him, to aid each of said assistant appraisers in the examination, inspection, and appraisement of goods, wares, and merchandise according to law; and no person shall be appointed such examiner who is not at the time of his appointment practically and thoroughly acquainted with the character, quality, and value of the article or articles in the examination and appraisement of which he is to be employed; nor shall any such examiner enter upon the discharge of his duties as such until he shall have taken and subscribed an oath faithfully and diligently to discharge such duties according to law; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall also appoint, on the nomination of the appraiser, the clerks, samplers, messengers, and other assistants employed in the appraiser's office, and shall limit and fix their number and compensation.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the appraiser, the assistant appraisers, examiners, clerks, samplers, messengers, or other assistants, or any of them, to engage or be employed in any commercial or mercantile business, or act as agent for any person engaged in such business, during the term of their appointment.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the appraiser who may be appointed under the provisions of this act shall receive a compensation of $5,000 per annum, and the assistant appraisers shall each receive a compensation of $3,500 per annum, to be paid out of the proceeds of the customs.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the compensation allowed respectively to the appraiser and the assistant appraisers, under the provisions of this act, shall be paid to them in monthly payments, and in due proportion for any period less than one month, for the time they may actually serve.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and all provisions of existing acts relating to the duties of the appraisers now provided for by law, or to any proceedings consequent or dependent upon the action of such appraisers, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be construed to apply to the appraisers and assistant appraisers provided for by this act, and shall be continued in full force, and that this act shall take effect on and after the 1st day of April, 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. This bill creates a great many officers, and provides that their salaries shall be paid out of the customs duties received at the port of New York.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That part of the bill is altered by an amendment which I propose offering, if the gentleman will suspend his point of order for a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think I understand the point of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I would state that the committee propose to amend the bill so that these officers shall be paid precisely in the same manner as other officers of the customs are paid. If gentlemen desire any explanation of this bill I will give it in a few words.

The bill which has just been read is the result of examinations made in relation to custom-house matters in New York city for the last two years. The Solicitor of the Treasury and a special agent of the Treasury Department were there for a long time, and made a report upon this whole subject. A bill was drawn up by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Solicitor of the Treasury, designed to cover certain abuses which are alleged to exist in the custom-house in New York city; and this bill is for that purpose.

Under existing laws there are now five appraisers and five assistant appraisers in the custom-house in New York city. The appraisers receive an annual salary of $2,500 each; the assistant appraisers a salary of $2,000 each. The total amount of salaries received under existing laws, by the appraisers and assistant appraisers, is $22,500. The result of the examination and observation of all parties connected with this matter was that the system of appraisement in New York was materially defective, and that great abuses have grown up under it. It is proposed by this bill, instead of having these five appraisers and five assistant appraisers, all the five appraisers being equal, and there being no head, to make one appraiser, and nine assistant appraisers. That is what the bill itself proposes. The Committee on Commerce propose to amend the bill by striking out "nine," and inserting "six," as the number of assistant appraisers; so that there will be in all seven appraisers, one chief and six assistants. The bill as sent to the committee proposed that the chief appraiser should receive an annual salary of $5,000, and the assistant appraisers an annual salary of $3,500 each. The committee propose to reduce the salary of the chief appraiser from $5,000 to $4,000, and the salaries of the assistant appraisers from $3,500 to $3,000 each, and by the third section we propose to make one of these assistant appraisers ex officio the inspector of drugs, thus doing away with that office entirely, which is now filled at an annual salary of $2,000; and in addition to the amendments I have mentioned, the committee propose an amendment, which will meet the point suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that these officers shall be paid precisely as other officers of customs are paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. The sixth section expressly provides that this chief appraiser and the assistant appraisers shall be "paid out of the proceeds of the customs." That may mean that they shall be paid in gold.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. To save any question, I will move an amendment when we reach that portion of the bill. I now move to amend section two by striking out the word "nine" and inserting the word "six," as the number of assistant appraisers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to amend section six by striking out the word "five" before the word "thousand" and inserting the word "four," as the salary of the chief appraiser.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to amend the same section by striking out the words "five hundred," after the words "three thousand," so that the salary of the assistant appraisers shall be $3,000 instead of $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move to amend the same section by striking out the words at the close, "out of the proceeds of the customs," and inserting the words "in the same manner as officers of the customs." That portion of the section will then read, "to be paid in the same manner as officers of the customs."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the fifth section the following:

And it is hereby provided, That, if any appraiser, assistant appraiser, clerk, sampler, messenger, or other assistant shall violate the provisions of this section, such person shall be dismissed from office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move further to amend by striking out all after the word "paid" in the third line of the seventh section, and inserting in lieu thereof "in the same manner as officers of the customs."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to address an inquiry to the gentleman. What is the extent and reason of the change made by this bill? Upon its face it alters the existing system.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It does alter the existing system, as a matter of course, to this extent: instead of the present system of five appraisers and five assistant appraisers, it provides for one chief appraiser and six assistant appraisers. In point of fact it gives a head to the institution.

Mr. CHANLER. Is that the only change which the bill will introduce?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is one change. Another provision changing the existing law is embraced in the amendment just adopted. That is, I think, a very important provision, because it is designed to punish all persons who, while acting as officers in the custom-house, engage in any commercial transaction which might influence their action.

Mr. CHANLER. Does it make any further change in the system now existing?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. None whatever.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether there is anything in this bill that makes it a punishable offense for any of these appraisers to receive presents from importers. That is a practice which has led to serious evils in the city of New York.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The existing laws, I believe, provide for the punishment of that offense.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman the propriety of including in the section which refers to penalties a penalty for that offense.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York will prepare an amendment which will embody his idea, I have no doubt that the House will adopt it. I understand, however, that there is now on the statute-book an enactment by which all offenses of that kind can be punished. If there be no such law now in force, it is very certain that we ought to enact a very stringent law on the subject.

Mr. ODELL. I would say to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] that a law reaching these cases was passed during the session of 1863. The crime is now punishable to the same extent as smuggling.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That was what I understood.

Mr. ODELL. The present law is amply sufficient to punish all offenders of that kind.

While I am upon the floor, I desire to say that I know something in reference to what will be the practical operation of the provisions embraced in this bill, and I can assure every member of the House that they will work a very beneficial change in the administration of affairs in the appraiser's office at the port of New York.

I regret exceedingly, however, that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has seen fit to propose to reduce the salary of the principal appraisers to $4,000, and that of the assistants to $3,000. Now, it is known to every gentleman acquainted with commercial matters that the appraiser's office at the port of New York is the key to the whole business of collecting the revenue of the country from customs. A higher class and character of men are required in the appraiser's office than in any other branch of the service of the United States. Every one of the six or seven men who may be appointed under this bill will have passing through his hands foreign goods amounting to millions upon millions of dollars. I therefore regret exceedingly that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has proposed this reduction of salary, especially as to the assistant appraisers. The services of men of the requisite character to fill these places are worth in the city of New York more than the sum first proposed in this bill. I believe that it will be the best judgment of the House to put that sum back into the bill, $3,500 for each of these men. The chairman has amended the bill, reducing the number, thus making a material saving in the expenditure, and I hope that he will consent to pay the assistant appraisers $3,500.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am glad to have an indorsement of the principle of the bill from the gentleman from New York, whose judgment and experience in these matters are worth a great deal. But I cannot agree with him in regard to the change of salaries.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VERIFICATION OF INVOICES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back House bill No. 697, further to provide for the verification of invoices.

The bill was read.

Mr. CHANLER. Has this reference to the consular system generally, or is it limited?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is an amendment to the bill of the last session in reference to frauds by false invoices.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT OF VESSELS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back House bill No. 738, relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels; which was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back House bill No. 667, to provide for two assistant inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois.

The bill was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill has been up before. I move to add the following:

And the local board of inspectors at Wheeling is hereby reestablished.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to know why the two local inspectors should be at Galena.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I explained that when the bill was up before. It is a matter of very little importance.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that it is a matter of great importance to put these inspectors where they can reach steamboats readily. I think one of these inspectors should be at Dubuque.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They must be both at the same place. It is a matter of little importance.

Mr. WILSON. Then why not put both of them at Dubuque?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I move to strike out "Galena" and insert "Lewiston."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not yield.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to amend the title so that it would read:

A bill to provide for two assistant inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York and two local inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to reestablish the board of local inspectors at Wheeling; and also to amend the act approved June 8, 1864, entitled "An act to create two additional inspectors of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection districts of Memphis and Oregon, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

MICHIGAN CITY HARBOR COMPANY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of certain citizens of Indiana and Illinois asking the Government to permit the Michigan City Harbor Company to use the foundations of the old Government piers at Michigan City, and that Michigan City may be made a port of delivery, have directed me to report a bill granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of the Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

The first section of the bill, which was read, grants to the Michigan City Harbor Company, at Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, the privilege of using the foundations of the old Government piers now in that harbor for the purpose of improving and protecting said harbor, provided that no expense made by said harbor company for such purpose shall be considered a charge against the Government of the United States.

The second section constitutes Michigan City a port of delivery, subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports; annexes said port to the collection district of Chicago, and provides that there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs, to reside at said port, at an annual salary of $350.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the vote to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VOTES RECORDED.

Mr. LOAN. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote upon the confiscation bill passed this morning.

Mr. MALLORY. I will not object if my colleague [Mr. HARDING] is also permitted to record his vote.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object, if it changes the result.

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object. If the two gentlemen desire to vote on opposite sides I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The chair understands that they desire to record their votes on opposite sides. No objection being made, Mr. LOAN recorded his vote in the affirmative, and Mr. HARDING in the negative.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the same bill.

Mr. MALLORY. And I ask permission that my colleague [Mr. GRIDER] have leave to record his vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. LE BLOND. It will not change the result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know how far this may go, hence I object. I know the bill is safe now, and I do not want the result changed.

SHIP WILLIAM F. STORER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution to change the name of the ship William F. Storer to Montana.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOYAL REFUGEES FROM TEXAS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported a bill for the purpose of checking contraband trade and to provide a fund for the relief of indigent loyal refugees from the State of Texas.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that during the existing rebellion or until the authority of the United States shall have been completely restored in the State of Texas, the commercial agent or consul of the United States at Matamoras, in Mexico, shall, pursuant to such instructions as may be given him by the Secretary of State, be authorized to charge one cent per pound upon all cotton, wool, and dry hides, and two cents upon all pecan nuts intended for shipment to any port of the United States; provided that the said commercial agent or consul shall be satisfied that such merchandise is the product of any State or Territory in rebellion against the United States.

The second section authorizes the said commercial agent or consul, under such instructions as may be given him by the Secretary of State, to apply the proceeds of such charge, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to the relief of indigent loyal citizens of the United States at Matamoras, refugees from the State of Texas.

The third section authorizes such commercial agent or consul to retain for his own expenses and services the residue of the fund so collected, provided that the same, together with the compensation now allowed him by law, shall be no more than at the rate of $3,000 per annum for such expenses and services; provided that all amounts of moneys remaining in the hands of such commercial agent or consul not applied under the provisions of this bill shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. Do I understand that the bill authorizes an export duty upon those articles?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Not exactly that.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it in the shape of a duty collected on all articles exported?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Exported from Matamoras and Mexico. If the gentleman will hear the letter of our late minister to Mexico read, and also the letter of the Secretary of State, I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to ask the gentleman where he gets the authority to authorize our consular agent at Matamoras, which is a foreign port, to levy a duty upon merchandise exported from that port?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is before he gives permission to have it shipped.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it not against our treaty with Mexico?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think not. I ask the Clerk to read Mr. Corwin's letter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 11, 1865.

SIR: Some days ago I spoke to your assistant about the situation of our commercial agent at Matamoras. Hundreds, nay thousands of loyal families are driven from Texas to Matamoras. Our consul at that place is obliged to take care of them. Mr. Pierce not long since sent a claim of about twelve hundred dollars, sustained by very good vouchers, money expended last year in this way. From what I saw in Mexico I wonder it is not more.

I think as rebellion in Texas brings this expense on our Government I would make the products of that State foot the bill. That can only be done by giving the commercial agent power to charge fees on cotton coming from Texas, and other articles, whereby a fund can be raised to pay for the expenses attending the care of loyal people driven by rebellion from that State, and also pay the agent for those extra services.

I send here-with a rough draft of a bill, with a statement of the necessary outlay of any one who acts for us there. The lately appointed agent, Mr. Wood, I hear is a very honest man. If this law is not passed he will not stay there three months.

The bearer of this, Mr. Lount, has resided in Matamoras, and can explain fully the situation of affairs there.

Very respectfully, THOMAS CORWIN.

Hon. W. H. SEWARD.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 15, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter of the 11th instant, addressed to this Department by Hon. Thomas Corwin, late United States minister at Mexico, suggesting the expediency of providing the commercial agent at Matamoras with means to relieve loyal refugees from Texas. A draft of a bill for the purpose accompanies Mr. Corwin's letter. If the committee should think favorably of the proposition, it is recommended that the bill be brought before Congress, with a view to its sanction by act or joint resolution.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURNE, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not had time to look at the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and our preceding treaties with Mexico, but it strikes me that such a discrimination as is here proposed is in direct conflict with all those treaties. If not, how is the consul to distinguish between Mexican products and those of the rebel States? I wish that we should proceed with caution, because it is not Mexico that we are dealing with here, but France in point of fact. It is necessary, therefore, that we should go slowly and be sure of our steps.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Committee on Commerce had before them Mr. Corwin in relation to another matter, and he brought this subject to their attention. He said that while he was our minister in Mexico a great many refugees from Texas made their way to him, and that they were in a most deplorable condition, starved, and almost naked, and something had to be done for them or else they would be starved to death. These men had been driven from Texas because of their loyalty and devotion to the flag of the country. Mr. Corwin said that he would go himself to the Secretary of State and explain the matter to him, and get the Secretary of State to address a letter on the subject to the Committee on Commerce. The Secretary of State has addressed such a letter to the Committee on Commerce, which has been read, and has prepared the bill which has been introduced here. I do not see any particular objection to that bill. If there be any objection the House can vote it down. It is a matter in which I feel no interest.

Mr. BROOKS. I suppose we all concur in what the gentleman says in reference to these Texan refugees, but the important question is this, can we do these things under the existing treaties? I do not think the House should act precipitately upon this subject.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he postpone this measure for a day or two.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will do so with great pleasure. I have simply made a statement of the effect of this bill. The House can act upon it as they see fit. I am willing that it shall be postponed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that this is rather an insidious measure, and that the House had better act upon it at once. This matter is to be left under the control of one man.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to hear everything that can be said for or against the bill, but I will move that it be postponed until Tuesday next after the morning hour. No member of the Committee on Commerce wants to press it here against the judgment of the House.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

B. C. BAILEY.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back adversely the bill (S. No. 48) for the relief of B. C. Bailey; which was laid on the table.

STEAMBOAT MAGNET.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the same committee, also reported back adversely a bill (S. No. 322) to change the name of the steamboat Magnet, of Buffalo, to Home; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the votes by which the two foregoing bills were laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF SALEM AND BEVERLY.

Mr. ELIOT, from the same committee, reported an act concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly; which was read a first and second time.

The first section abolishes the office of naval officer for the district of Salem and Beverly in the State of Massachusetts. The second section abolishes the office of surveyor of said district, to reside at Beverly. The third section fixes the salary of surveyor of said district hereafter at $400 per annum.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMEASUREMENT OF VESSELS.

Mr. ELIOT, from the same committee, also reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," approved May 4, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the act referred to shall be so construed that no part of any ship or vessel shall be admeasured or registered for tonnage that is used for cabins or state-rooms, and constructed entirely above the first deck, which is not a deck to the hull.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that this bill entirely relieves the steamboats on the western waters from the effects of the admeasurement act.

Mr. ELIOT. It is intended to relieve them. That is the object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed that was the design of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House at the next session of Congress the operation of the act of May 6, 1864, to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels, as shall exhibit, first, the effect of said act on the amount of registered tonnage, distinguishing between sailing vessels and others; second, the expediency of any modification for perfecting said act; and to indicate such additional legislation as the commerce and tonnage of the United States may render proper in order to provide a just and uniform admeasurement applicable to steamers and sailing vessels.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. ELIOT, from the same committee, also reported back, with amendments, an act (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1815, and for other purposes, the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The first section enacts that the first sentence of the second section of the act referred to, "that it shall be lawful for any collector, naval officer, surveyor, or inspector of the customs, as well in any adjoining district as that to which he belongs, to stop, search, and examine any carriage or vehicle, of any kind whatsoever, and to stop any person traveling on foot, or beast of burden, on which he shall suspect there are goods, wares, or merchandise which are subject to duty, or which shall have been introduced into the United States in any manner contrary to law; and if such officer shall stop any goods, wares, or merchandise on any such carriage, vehicle, person traveling on foot, or beast of burden, which he shall have probable cause to believe are subject to duty, or have been unlawfully introduced into the United States, he shall seize and secure the same for trial," shall be revived and made perpetual; and declares that every such beast of burden, carriage, or vehicle, together with the teams or other motive power, and all the appurtenances used in conveying such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture in like manner as is by law now provided in regard to such goods, wares, and merchandise; and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered under this act, or in consequence of such seizures, shall be disposed of as is provided in other cases by the ninety-first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799; and repeals the last proviso of said ninety-first section.

The second section extends the power and authority given to collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, by the sixty-eighth section of the said last-mentioned act, to inspectors of the customs; and authorizes any officer or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, incurred under this or any other law of the United States, to be examined as a witness in any of the proceedings for the recovery of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture by either of the parties thereto, and such examination shall not deprive such witness of his or her share or interest in such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

Mr. ELIOT. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to move to amend by striking out the words "made perpetual" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "reënacted;" so that it will read, "and the same is hereby revived and reënacted."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ELIOT. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in case any store, warehouse, or other building shall be upon or near the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable goods are deposited or have been placed therein, or carried through or into the same without payment of duties, and in violation of law, and the collector, deputy collector, naval officer, or surveyor of customs shall make oath before any magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has reason to believe and does believe that such offense has been therein committed, such officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto; and if any such goods shall be found therein, the same, together with such building, shall be seized, forfeited, and disposed of according to law, and the said building shall be forthwith taken down or removed, and any person or persons who shall have received or deposited in such building, or carried through the same, any goods as aforesaid, or shall have aided therein, in violation of law, shall, upon due conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act of April 2, 1844, entitled "An act directing the disposition of certain unclaimed goods, wares, or merchandise, seized for being illegally imported into the United States," be so amended that in place of the word "one," wherever the same may be found in said section, the word "five" shall be inserted.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] who has charge of this bill, to make some explanation of the full scope of the bill. It seems to me that it is intended to interfere with smuggling; but I could not fully understand it from hearing it read from the Clerk's desk. I would ask the gentleman to explain a little more fully the application of this bill. The interests which I represent in part are more or less commercial, and I should be glad to understand the bill before I am called upon to vote on it. I do not ask this for the purpose of caviling, but I ask for information.

Mr. ELIOT. I will answer the gentleman by sending to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor of submitting for your consideration inclosed draft of a "bill to revive part of an act therein named, and for other purposes."

The numerous expedients resorted to recently to evade the customs laws, and deprive the revenues, especially on our extended northern and northeastern frontiers, render additional legislation of the character designed by this bill highly desirable. The act of March 3, 1815, (3 Stat., p. 23,) part of which the bill is intended to revive, expired by limitation of the act of March 3, 1817, (3 Stat., 396,) by which it was temporarily revived, and since then there has existed no authority for stopping and searching carriages and other land vehicles other than those crossing our frontiers. It is proposed to revive this authority, and to extend the provisions of the sixty-eighth section of the collection act of 1799, authorizing searches of houses, &c., under proper judicial warrants to inspectors.

This is believed to be necessary, as many of the collection districts are so large that the delays consequent upon procuring the "special" authority now required from collectors, naval officers, or surveyors for suing out search warrants to be executed at points remote from the port of entry, often frustrate the objects sought to be accomplished.

I think it would add materially to the efficacy of the law if the vehicles and beasts of burden, with all that appertains to them, were subjected to forfeiture, as is provided by the bill.

The other provision regarding the giving of testimony by officers and others interested in the forfeitures are believed to be necessary also to an efficient execution of the revenue laws.

With great respect,

W. P. FESSENDEN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States House of Representatives.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask that the following letter also be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DISTRICT OF CHAMPLAIN, COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
PLATTSBURG, February 8, 1865.

SIR: There are along this frontier quite a number of stores and groceries, one half said to be in the States, the other in Canada, which affords great facilities for smuggling. Some of these have a line drawn upon the floor, which they claim is the exact boundary line. Some of the "groceries" have their casks of liquor so placed that while the liquor is in Canada the end of the faucet is in the States.

You will readily comprehend how this practice affects trade, and how wide a door it opens for smuggling. I would very much like to break up this whole business, for it is a fraud upon both Governments, and these marked-out lines are often undoubtedly some rods from the true one.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. DUNN, Collector.

Hon. N. SARGENT, Commissioner of Customs, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANLER. My attention had been drawn to this subject before. My reason for asking the question I did was for the purpose of drawing out this information; and I am gratified to receive it. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to this fact, that we are now in the year 1865; this war has been going on for years; this system has been going on increasing annually; yet up to this moment, notwithstanding the immense loss along the whole coast, the Government has remained silent with regard to suppressing the system of smuggling, and the city of New York, and every other city upon the coast, have been robbed of millions, owing to the utter neglect of the Administration in power to extend its protecting arm along the frontier. And coming at this time, late as it is, with a renewed lease of power to the Administration, it stands on record as an additional proof that they left the doors open for all means of corruption, and for the purposes of power. It was for the purpose of drawing attention here and elsewhere to that fact that I rose to put the question to the gentleman representing the Committee on Commerce. I am delighted with the information which my inquiry has elicited; and I believe that the country will receive it as a proof of the growth of patriotism in the right direction on the part of this Administration.

Mr. ELIOT. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I will say in the first place that I am glad to assure myself that this bill will receive his support. I may say to him further that if he will examine the statutes which have been passed since the beginning of this rebellion he will find that Congress has adopted from time to time different measures for the express purposes of preventing this system of smuggling upon our frontier; that Congress has endeavored from time to time to counteract the difficulties which the officers of the Government have encountered in administering the laws. It has been found that the ingenuity of men who love money more than they do honor, and who are ready at any time to expose their lives for the sake of gain, has invented means of evading one law after another; and it has been found necessary to meet them from point to point, passing laws as the exigencies of the case seemed to call for them. The present bill has been rendered necessary by the action of the smugglers who have endeavored to evade or defeat the laws heretofore passed. Sir, the present Administration has done all within its power to stop smuggling, and I call upon the gentleman from this time forth, during the period that he shall remain with us, to aid the Administration in its efforts to prevent or punish smuggling on the frontier.

I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third; being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT COLLECTOR AT JERSEY CITY.

Mr. ELIOT. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with a recommendation that it pass, bill (S. No. 454) entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant assessor to reside at Jersey City,'" approved February 21, 1863.

The bill was read.

It authorizes the assistant assessor appointed under the act to which it is a supplement to enroll and license, according to the laws of the United States, all vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries, owned in whole or in part by residents in the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in the State of New Jersey, such enrollments or licenses to be as valid and effectual as if made in any other part of the United States. It is also provided that the assistant assessor, in the discharge of this duty, shall be subject to all the penalties and responsibilities imposed by the laws of the United States upon collectors in like cases.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DECREASE OF AMERICAN NAVIGATION.

Mr. ELIOT. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives, at the next session of Congress, any facts and information upon the subject referred to in the communication of Edwin G. Easton to Hon. William H. Seward, accompanying this resolution, that shall be required in order to determine what legislation, if any, is expedient and proper, and to indicate such legislative action as shall be deemed necessary.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is required for its consideration to-day. Is there any objection?

Mr. BROOKS. I will not object if the gentleman will explain what the resolution means.

Mr. ELIOT. The resolution refers to a communication submitted with it concerning the decrease of our navigation, and containing suggestions in regard to the subject—a subject upon which the Committee on Commerce believe it would be desirable to act. But they are not prepared to act at this time; and the object of the resolution is to procure more information.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back Senate bill No. 310, for the promotion of commerce and the improvement of navigation.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. The bill contains an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The measure is an entirely new one to the House, and I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that instead of pressing it now he will agree to postpone its further consideration until some future time. If he does that I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ELIOT. To what day would the gentleman like to have it postponed?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to its being considered in the House on any condition.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill, under the rules, goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELIOT. Cannot the bill be considered in the House as if in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It appropriates $169,000 to buy a lot of old maps and charts.

Mr. ELIOT. It is an appropriation that ought to be made.

The SPEAKER. The bill has gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported adversely on House bill No. 739, to prohibit the slave trade between the several States of the Union, and various memorials on the same subject, and moved that they be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE FEES.

Mr. LONGYEAR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back House bill No. 739, to regulate the fees of custom-house officers on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States.

The bill was read.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand that the bill taxes tonnage. I see that it is confined to the lakes.

Mr. LONGYEAR. It is to create uniformity in fees collected on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers.

Mr. STEVENS. It does not levy tonnage duties?

Mr. LONGYEAR. It does not.

Mr. GANSON. How much does it increase the fees?

Mr. LONGYEAR. There is no increase, but in some instances there is a decrease. It is to make the fees more uniform.

Mr. GANSON. Is it made uniform up or down?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It strikes a general average.

Mr. LONGYEAR. Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is twofold. The first is to render uniformity in the fees of custom-house officers upon the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers; and the second is to remedy an evil in reference to the fees for entrance and clearance of foreign vessels. By section four of the act of 1831 these duties were in fact abolished. That section four was repealed at the last session of Congress, and it left a general provision to apply. It was found that that provision has been differently construed on different parts of the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers. The object of the bill is to create uniformity in this respect.

Another difficulty was in regard to fees for entrance and clearance of foreign vessels. It was found that on the lakes and rivers, especially on the Detroit river, where steamboats touch half the time in Canada and half the time in the United States, they were compelled to pay these enormous duties. We remedy that.

The only new legislation in the bill is the last clause, which provides that there shall be paid for a certificate setting forth the names of the owners of a vessel, with their respective interest, and also the material facts of any existing bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or other incumbrance; the date and amount of such incumbrance, and the parties thereto, one dollar; provided, no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, conveyance, or discharge of mortgage or other incumbrance of any vessel, shall be recorded unless the same is duly acknowledged before a notary public or other officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONGYEAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the committee on immigration House bill No. 746, to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes.

Mr. COX. This is a very long bill, and I do not wish to have it read. If the gentleman from Illinois will explain its object I have no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to action upon that bill now.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is not before the House.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill of the House

(No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft, made a special order under a suspension of the rules. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to the second section.

Mr. BLAINE. In order to meet objections made the other day to my amendment I desire to modify it so that it may meet general acceptance. I modify the amendment so that it shall read:

Provided, That in any call for troops no county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, shall have credit except for men actually furnished on said call or a preceding call by said county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, and mustered into the military or naval service on the quota thereof.

Mr. CHANLER. This, as I understand it, is an amendment to the second section, which relates to the question of quotas. Now, I wish to draw the attention of the House to that matter, and to the existing confusion which is consequent upon it in every district in the country. The whole military system has been thrown into confusion by the way those quotas have been distributed, and it is a question whether the trouble which will follow this effort may not be ruinous and fatal to the military organization of the country. There have been here from different sections of the country legislative committees seeking for a fair adjustment of these quotas. The matter is in a perfect snarl, and the Provost Marshal General seems to be in a muddle, and a fair adjustment of the draft is impossible under the existing system. From time to time I have endeavored to secure, through the action of this House, full and satisfactory information relative to the assignment of these quotas and the basis upon which they are made, but I have been unable to accomplish my purpose.

Now, sir, I am opposed to having any amendment made here in ignorance and without sufficient and full information before this body. I have no doubt that the gentleman who has charge of this bill is perfectly sincere and honest in his efforts. I do not impute to him or to any other member who is acting in defense of this bill, or to those who, in an official capacity, are trying to carry out the law of Congress, anything but fair motives. My object is not, as some gentlemen would have the House believe, to oppose this bill on all occasions. I am opposed to the bill, but I am ready to modify my action upon full and just information given by the Department so that we can act understandingly.

This section should be amended so as to meet two difficulties which arise under it. The parties having no residence are, as I understand it, aliens or freedmen. Now, sir, there exists in the Army to-day a great source of weakness, and a great depreciation of the value and dignity of your soldiers. By the introduction of aliens into the Army you have depreciated the value of your volunteers. And then you degrade the American soldier by placing him side by side with the slave just set free, men without historical association, and up to that time without rights. Now, sir, I maintain that such a policy is bad, and that this section is inherently bad from that standpoint.

A substitute is a luxury of the rich. The draft must fall, like death and taxation, at last on the poor man. By the enrollment act we have called out a gigantic standing Army; but for some cause, only known at the War Office, if even known there, it has never been consolidated and organized into a thorough and harmonious force. We have made "I will" wait upon "I would." We have delayed so long and changed so often that improvement of this law seems impossible. The Administration raised troops and money too easily to stop and think on consequences. As if not content with the evils we had, our discreet rulers flew to those they knew not of. We bought and bribed the slave from his master and turned him into a military machine, commanded by officers holding commissions directly from the President, and then we put these colored troops by that course next in rank to the regulars, reducing the white volunteer force to a third rank, and the doomed conscripts to a fourth rank in the service. We raised the negro to an equality with the white by statute, but put the white below the negro in arms. It was degradation to the white race to put arms into the hands of the negro, but it is putting the ruling race beneath degradation to subordinate them to the black freedman. The result has become apparent in the difficulty of filling the quotas, when the regular Army recruiting officer comes in competition with the volunteer recruiting committee. The enlistments are more in favor of the regular Army recruiting offices and the colored troops, notwithstanding the smaller bounty offered by the Government. The white substitute is being driven from the Army by the lower-priced negro, invited to take his place in the van in the onward march to glory.

Thus far the effect has only been seen in the volunteer force. But if this war continues much longer and the black man is the hero some members claim that he is, the same result must eventually follow in the regular Army. The rapid changes of revolution, the demand for labor, the scarcity of money, or rather the excessive expansion of the currency, the demand for troops to supply the waste of war and disease, the cheapness of the black compared with the white soldier, must tend to increase the enlistment of colored troops, and finally will force this Administration or its successors to hold its own at the back of an Army of freedmen. The standing Army will then, indeed, be compact and serviceable for the most despotic uses. Servile in its nature, it will become the ready tool of tyranny, as soon as the future military dictator, for whom all these things seem to have been prepared, shall summon the people of this Union to surrender to his genius and his arms.

Further than this, owing to the same causes just enumerated, suppose the Army be recruited, not from the negro, but from the foreign substitute just landed on our shores, brave, hardy, full of adventure, with the world before him, and no cares or kin to check his onward course of fearless enterprise. How long will he remain a mere soldier in our ranks? What does he know of or care for the Constitution, or the time-honored institutions of any State, or of the Union? He will exclaim, "The world is my field and its wealth my prize."

In a collision with Europe, should such occur, having driven the American citizen from our Army by underbidding him, having cut off all sympathy of the great mass of the people with this Government by trampling on their most sacred and most cherished rights, how do you calculate to again arouse the volunteer spirit in the nation? We have insulted a free and courageous people by this conscription. We reduce the volunteer to a mercenary by the bounty. We have depreciated the alien mercenary by enrolling the slave, and the slave has degraded the career of the soldier. Such is the promise held out by our present policy for the future condition of the Army when the existing force of veterans is disbanded or destroyed.

Again, the policy pursued invites either, first, a collision between the white and black races, with banishment or annihilation of the latter; or, second, a surrender of the bayonet to the black man while the white race holds the sword. This experiment has been tried by England in India, we know with what fearful consequences. It has been practically the system in Mexico until the Spanish creoles were all officers, and the private soldiers of a feeble, mixed race, forming an army weak in time of war, and turbulent and mercenary in time of peace. The bayonets and artillery of France, wielded by Frenchmen, commanded by Frenchmen, will soon fix the fate of that military organization.

The tendency of the policy of putting one race over another is to make the officer despise his men and the men hate their officers. Bonaparte crushed the power of the old French nobility in the armies of France at a single blow when he declared that every soldier of the great nation carried the baton of a marshal of France in his knapsack. Can we bestow such a boon on the private soldiers in our armies as now constituted? Have you not, in fact, established a military aristocracy in the heart of our Army? We exclude the black recruit from the honors of his career, and declare he shall die that another may attain them. Sir, the policy of the Administration is logically driving the Army to discord and revolt. The party in power must take one horn of the dilemma their conduct creates, and commission our black soldiers as officers, or they must follow the consequences of the opposite, and while declaring all men free and equal, and uttering promises of freedom to the negro slave, they must hold him in the more miserable plight of an armed serf, doomed to the toil of battle, the sufferings and sickness which a soldier's life entails, and finally to die in military shackles, the victim of a hope raised by a false fanaticism for a political advantage, created by this Administration to avoid the dangers it forces him to meet in its defense.

I am opposed to the establishment of black military serfs in American armies. I am opposed to the degradation of our white soldier by the policy of this Administration. I am opposed to promoting the black freedman, however brave he may be, to the rank of an officer in the United States Army.

But there is a project on foot in that direction, and finally must succeed if the present policy continues and the Republican party remains in power. European Governments may do this thing with impunity, because an aristocracy, social, legal, and supreme, controls all the avenues to power, rank, and honor. In my opinion, if the negro is admitted as a soldier into our armies, he will be subdued by the superior race and become the base of a military aristocracy in fact if not in law; and the same result that followed slavery in the South will be seen wherever the negro is introduced as a prevailing and permanent element of society, namely, a white aristocracy of superior caste, rising on the shoulders of the negro to the mastery of the poor whites around them. It is fixed in the law of race, and is immutable. I have no fear for the superior race, I only fear lest the liberties of the people may be subverted by a military aristocracy or an aristocracy of caste. The conflict is upon us, and we must meet it openly and frankly. And in the same spirit of frankness it must be admitted that had the Administration adhered to the practice established in the Constitution, of leaving the manner of raising quotas to the States themselves, then no collision as to the relative claims or rights of soldiers of the United States would have arisen. Each State would have regulated that for itself. The conflict of races would have been kept from our national Congress, and the agitation of the public mind by so absorbing and deep a subject have remained locked up in the precincts of the several States, like fire, or steam, or gunpowder, controlled, cribbed, confined, harmless, useful and beneficial.

A new danger seems to hang over us in the gathering storm of foreign war. It may be far off, or at this moment a secret council of the crowned heads of Europe may be partitioning this Union among themselves or their assigns, as they did once for unhappy Poland; as they have just done for subjugated Mexico, and the republic of St. Domingo. The course of France, Spain, and England in regard to those distracted and betrayed republics has roused our people and this House to an attitude of watchful defiance. The Monroe doctrine in its first and highest sense has been reasserted here and accepted by the whole country as a pledge of our future policy. We have declared that no monarchy can be established and upheld here with our consent. Under such circumstances, with our knowledge of the facility with which the negro is induced, by flattering promises, to desert his home and the associations of his life, is it not well to be guarded in the trust we put in him after our failure to fulfill the fond hope of his ignorant nature, and our selfish use of his race? With Europe, rich in the resources of war and diplomacy, with everything to gain by tampering with and protecting the black race as an element of discord in our midst, we may find ourselves in the relation to our freedmen that the rebel States now hold to us in the treatment of their slaves, with this disadvantage to the United States, that we have armed the slave and trained him to a freedom which he will never relinquish, while the unarmed slaves of the South dare not turn upon their masters in arms. The Administration, by the conscription, seems likely to force the white laboring classes out of the Army to give place to an element which would prove hostile in foreign war to the very system which liberated and armed them.

But there is another point of view I would present in this connection. If the conscription has been a failure in the war against the rebels, what have we to hope from it in conflict with Europe? Substitutes fresh from the Old World may or may not become mercenary. They might be true to our flag, which they never saw until enlisted, through all the fortunes of war; or they might after a protracted contest take our cause into their own hands and go over to the enemy; or, like their Vandal ancestors, put the price of the Republic in a scale and kick the beam; or, like the Huns, treat first with the enemies of the Republic, and coolly betray the cause they rushed so wildly to defend. As the Representative of a large foreign population, I can testify, did the history of the war not make it useless, to the love the adopted citizen bears to our common country, to our free institutions, and to her flag. But every battlefield is a glorious witness to their zeal, bravery, and patriotism. I deem our cause safe in such hands; but the high bounty and the general system introduced by the enrollment act tend to drive all our citizens, native and foreign-born, from the service, and has caused to be imported direct from abroad an alien and perhaps dangerous population, in every degree different from the immigrant who formerly brought the simple virtues and sterling habits of the laboring classes of the Old World from the field, the workshop, and the mine.

Mr. BLAINE. I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word of the amendment. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that I do not understand him as opposing my amendment. He has not spoken in reference to it at all.

Mr. CHANLER. I spoke to the section.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, the section and the amendment, taken together, commend themselves to the support of every member of the House who wishes to do away with these great frauds upon the people, who pay enormous bounties and get no equivalent for them. As I said the other day, the adoption of this section as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, with this amendment upon it, will cut up by the roots all the frauds and malpractices that have grown up under the two mischievous sections, allowing recruiting in rebel States and naval credits. Both these provisions should be suspended summarily. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and hope the vote will be taken on my amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate insisted on the amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House No. 640, providing for a district and a circuit court for the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. FOSTER, STEWART, and JOHNSON, the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the second amendment and had disagreed to the first amendment to the bill of the Senate No. 389, relating to clerkships in the War Department.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the second amendment and had disagreed to the other amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate relating to the postal laws.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution and bills of the House of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British steamers Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter;

Bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit court in the district of Virginia; and Bill (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 558) to authorize the issuing of patents for certain lands in the town of Stockbridge, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 114) making a grant of lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

The question being on Mr. BLAINE's amendment,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. While I admit that evils have grown up under the system of credits, and while there are, perhaps, radical errors at the bottom of the whole system, yet, if we undertake to make this change now great injustice may be done to some sections of the country. For this reason I am opposed to the amendment. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BLAINE called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 36, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Ashley, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Brounall, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Henry, Dixon, Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dingle, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Elliot, English, Frick, Frank, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingels, Jencks, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Starr, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Ganson, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Herlick, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazarus, Lombard, William H. Miller, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Siles, Strouse, Townsend, and Winfield—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Amos, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Bottwell, Brundage, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cresswell, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knox, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKim, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, James H. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Nelson, Orth, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, Tracy, Voorhes, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—62.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, to remove the objection made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] I move to amend the second section by inserting after the word "residence" the words "within the United States;" so that it will read, "if such persons have an actual residence within the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all persons mustered into the military or naval service, whether as volunteers, substitutes, representatives, or otherwise, shall be credited to the State and to the ward, township, precinct, or other enrollment sub-district where such persons belong by actual residence, (if such persons have an actual residence within the United States), and where such persons were or shall be enrolled, (if liable to enrollment); and it is hereby made the duty of the Provost Marshal General to make such rules and give such instructions to the several provost marshals, boards of enrollment, and mustering officers as shall be necessary for the faithful enforcement of the provisions of this section, to the end that fair and just credit shall be given to every section of the country.

Mr. UPSON. Before the question is taken on striking out the section I move to amend it by inserting after the word "enrollment" the words "provided that persons not liable to enrollment or draft, who may hereafter volunteer, shall be credited to such sub-district as they may elect at the time of their enlistment." It will be seen that the section, as it now stands, does not provide for transient persons or foreigners.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly it does.

Mr. UPSON. As the persons not liable to draft or enrollment do not swell the quota, there is no injustice in allowing them to elect where they shall be credited. It is to govern the case of foreigners and transient persons that I propose my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am opposed to the amendment for the reason that instead of perfecting the section it would destroy it. The whole object of this section, as must be obvious to gentlemen, is to require the crediting of recruits and substitutes and drafted men to the sub-districts to which they actually belong, where, if they have any residence at all, their actual residence is to be found; but the effect of the amendment now proposed would be to throw open the door and restore pro tanto the present existing law that they shall be credited to such districts or sub-districts as they shall elect.

Mr. UPSON. Where does the gentleman propose to have men credited who are foreigners and have no residence here?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no necessity for making any provision for them. They are left under the general law. It is only those who have actual residence within the United States that require to be thus credited. The law is untouched as regards aliens. I hold that if there be any distinction this is the most wholesome of all the sections contained in this bill. It cuts up by the roots the greatest of all the evils under which we now labor in the enrollment, and the drafting after the enrollment, with the propriety to be considered toward the people of this country unable to do military duty, for the purpose of filling up the ranks of our armies.

If you require that those who are drafted or are put in as substitutes or as recruits shall have an actual residence in some of the sub-districts of the United States, and shall be credited to those districts, the first effect will be to prevent towns, townships, and counties from bidding against each other in a strife to offer the largest bounties in order to get the greatest number of recruits. Thus you do away with that source of corruption which has led to the introduction of that most villainous of all systems, the system of substitute brokerage. If men, when they are credited, are to be credited to the sub-district within which they belong, then the competition can be only within the districts. As it is now the large cities and towns are enabled to draw off the country population. The large cities and towns and various counties in the States hold out inducements to draw away from the country districts and from the sub-districts the men who, instead of filling their own quotas, go off and sell themselves to brokers in some other parts of the country where they are promised larger bounties. This would not be so bad if it inured even to the benefit of the substitute himself. But every one who knows anything about the practices of this most unmitigated set of scoundrels upon the face of the earth, the substitute brokers, knows that in nine cases out of ten the broker pockets nearly if not quite all the money given for bounty, and the man who is enlisted gets none of it. Now, to cut this all up by the roots it is proposed by the committee that these men shall no longer have inducements to sell themselves to fill up quotas away from home; that they shall no longer be parties, even innocently, to the frauds practiced by those brokers; but that every man shall help out his own neighborhood and his own district by helping to supply the quota of troops called for from that sub-district.

I think the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] so far as it goes, will operate simply to defeat this wholesome effect of this section; such an amendment will merely throw us back upon the old system of allowing each man to elect the district to which he shall be credited. The aliens are already protected by the introduction of the words "within the United States," leaving the question open in regard to those who are not resident within the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States;

An act (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter;

An act (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes; and

An act (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RADFORD asked and obtained leave to be absent from to-night's session.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the section by inserting after the words "actual residence" the words "in any of the United States not in rebellion." As the section now stands, if a refugee from any State in rebellion should come into any of the loyal States, and there be mustered into service under the provisions of this bill, it would be at his option to be credited to the locality or district from whence he came, and the district where he was enlisted or mustered in would not receive credit for him. Therefore I think it but just that the bill should be amended in this respect, so that if refugees from States who do not contribute to the naval and military forces of the United States shall come into those States which under this bill are required to contribute, these States shall have the benefit of the persons thus coming, and not the States from which they came.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I will join most cordially in every effort which the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs may make to do away with this system of bounty jumping and substitute brokerage. There has never been in the history of this or any other country a more corrupt and detestable organization of men than those who center around the recruiting offices under the name of substitute brokers. And this circumstance furnishes a peculiar illustration of the argument which I have heretofore urged and will continue to urge against the whole system of drafting. Commend it as you may, "the trail of the serpent" is over it still. It is corrupting the Army and demoralizing the whole country.

All the evils resulting from this law seem to grow and look more dangerous in presence of the power which it confers upon the Executive. There is not a stronger Government extant than this. It is useless and unnecessary to discuss the course which leads to the grant of powers to the President. The bald fact shines out on every page of our annals during this rebellion. No czar, emperor, king, or potentate has a greater revenue, troops organized in larger armies, or more extensive navies, than those which obey the undisputed will of the President of the United States at this moment. Billions of money fill his coffers; millions of slaves, just set free or soon to be, bow in servile admiration of his august name. Millions of free men depend on his will for life, liberty, and happiness; and his will is law. No constitutional check holds him, as it once did his predecessors, in wholesome subordination. His friends, his creatures, and his liberated slaves, watch his eye for the motive to their every act—subservient, devoted, or mercenary. Politician, soldier, or citizen—all willingly look, or are forced to look to him, as the source of power in this Government—for one will rules here. His courtly press calls him sovereign, and chronicles his every deed as of royal import. We carry Cæsar and his fortunes. The nation is a representative democracy; its capital is a monarchy; perhaps some may prefer to call it a republic. A distinction without a difference—tyranny under a sacred name. Venice was a republic—powerful, victorious, and great; her executive a doge, who ruled by a secret council of ten for life. Our Executive rules by the secret council of his Cabinet for a limited term. England under Cromwell was a republic; but we would search in vain for representative liberty during the usurpation of the Protector.

Have we not reason to pause here, before conferring new powers, or at least to consider the wisdom of revoking, at this time, some of the unlimited powers already conferred by this military system upon the Executive? Have we not good reason to apprehend that, at some not very remote period in this struggle, our cause may be sacrificed on the altar of personal ambition? We have made the prize so great, the power so vast, the task so easy, to such as dare "wade through slaughter to a throne," that prudence, if not patriotism, should check our headlong course of hasty legislation in adding to or continuing the power of the sword and purse in the grasp of one man, to our own humiliation, and perhaps our destruction. If we can boast of a mimic little Cromwell, "guiltless of his country's blood," who has led our Puritan hosts to doughty deeds, how long are we to await the coming of some silent and selfish General Monk?

There is a similitude in the facts and dangers which link the spirits of liberty and fanaticism now as they were linked in the days of the great Cromwell. May not the Puritans of to-day seize with reckless hands the mace which marks the presence of popular sovereignty in this Hall, and in the words of their archetype bid some soldier of fortune at their heels "Take away that bauble?" They have long since beheaded the Constitution. History repeats herself, and teaches by example; but nations are dull scholars, and fanatics are blind. Have they not already forced you to succumb to their dictation, and robbed you of some of the most honored and best-established privileges of this body?

Does the Executive really need your aid to carry on this Government? I think not. He seems to have thought not when he pledged, after adjournment of the last Congress, the credit of the nation without law, and in defiance of the peculiar right of this House to initiate all money bills; and allow me to remind this House that it was in connection with the military power that the President committed that treasonable breach of law. Practically, the Executive is now independent of all legislative authority in this Government. Actually, the conscripts, the veterans, and colored troops are his own and not the nation's soldiers. He commissions their officers directly himself, or through his partisans. It is true the past career of the different Presidents of this Union give us little to fear from personal malevolence or desperate daring; but there is a political cunning which sometimes covers ambition with a comic mask, and serves as a shield behind which to shoot fatal shafts at the liberties of the people, the rights of the States, the spirit of the Constitution, and the existence of this Union. I will not presume to probe the motives of the Administration; we are asked to believe that they are good. The present Chief Magistrate may become as famous as any of the great founders of the Union he has sworn to protect. He may be as wise and brave as Washington; as bold and firm as Jackson; as upright and politic as Adams; as great and good as Madison; as continental and broadly national as Monroe; but his course has not yet developed fully the qualities which may promise such fame for himself, or such glory for his country, as cluster around the name of the humblest of his predecessors.

Now we may not praise him.

"Et laudas nullo nisi mortuos poetas."

His labors are those of Hercules, but he is without claims as a hero. The Augean stable of the Treasury balks his genius and paralyzes his nerve. His tasks are already so laborious that no human hand can perform them alone. And he is no demigod. He may be the instrument of the Ruler of nations to scourge us to humility, but need we anticipate him by useless degradation and by abandonment of our duty, by adding to his powers at this time? Should we not rather seek now to limit them?

Sir, let us remember that we too are instruments to check the overbearing conduct of the Executive in the administration of this Government; that we are here to protect the people of this Union amid the confusion and conflict of this civil war, in the reasonable hope that in peace posterity may bless our names. And with the growing likelihood of peace diminishes the necessity of conscription. The people look to their Representatives as agents for good and not for evil, as swift messengers to bring glad tidings and avert the sorrows, if possible, which attend on nations as on men. The burdens of the people now are almost too heavy to be borne by even a self-governed nation. They look to us for prompt and effectual relief. I trust the time for the realization of their hope has come.

The hour of half past five having arrived, the House took a recess till seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

INDIAN TRUST BONDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting and recommending the passage of a bill authorizing the surrender of the bonds held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior for Indian tribes belonging to Virginia to West Virginia for like amount of obligations to the latter-named State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL JURISDICTION IN TEXAS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, a bill to establish civil jurisdiction over the eleventh judicial district in the State of Texas, composed of the counties of El Paso, Presidio, and Worth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

REIMBURSEMENT TO MISSOURI.

Mr. BLOW. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill (S. No. 359) entitled "An act to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States." I hope that the bill will be considered by the House now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the reporting of the bill, but I must insist that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOW. Then I withdraw the bill.

TRAVEL ON RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution relating to travel and transportation of soldiers and citizens on the railroads and post roads of the United States, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to move that the House proceed to the consideration of bill (H. R. No. 682) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1866. But before making that motion I ask unanimous consent that that bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman from Vermont to let the Indian appropriation bill lie over for the present. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has some amendments, I understand, to propose, is absent. It was expected that he would have returned to the city to-day. I know he feels an interest in the subject.

Mr. MORRILL. We are now in the last week but one of the session, and only one appropriation bill has passed both Houses of Congress. This is a long bill, and if the Committee on Indian Affairs have amendments to propose, it is certainly their duty to be here. I am informed that many of the amendments of that committee are in the hands of other members of that committee, and will be offered at the proper time.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I am not prepared to say that the gentleman from Minnesota has amendments in his hands to offer. I know that he feels a deep interest in regard to Indian matters.

Mr. MORRILL. This is to carry out treaty stipulations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not this the ordinary Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It is, with a few additions. The SPEAKER. The first reading of the bill for information, as it is a long one, will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Chippewas of Saginaw, Swan creek, and Black river.

For last of ten equal annual installments in coin, to be distributed per capita, in the usual manner of paying annuities, per second article of the treaty of August 2, 1855, $10,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see any reason for the retention of the words "in coin" in the bill as it is a discrimination against the currency, and I therefore move that they be stricken out.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope not.

Mr. MORRILL. We may strike those words out, but it would be in violation of the treaty with these Indians. The treaty stipulates that the money shall be paid in coin.

Mr. HOLMAN. When was the treaty made?

Mr. MORRILL. In 1855.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will have the stipulation of the treaty read. I hardly think that at that time we discriminated against the currency of the United States. I insist on my amendment to strike out the words "in coin."

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the words will not be stricken out. I think that we ought to pay all of these Indians in coin under treaty stipulations. Instead of striking out here we ought to make it broader and applicable to all treaties with these Indians.

Mr. MORRILL. It was provided in the treaty that the money should be paid in coin.

Mr. HOLMAN. Every citizen who understood that he would get coin is now getting currency.

Mr. PRUYN. They stand in a different position from citizens of the United States. They have no delegates, no representation here, and they cannot control our legislation. It strikes me that under all of these treaty stipulations these Indians ought to be paid in coin.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope that the bill will remain as it is, and that we will deal honestly with these unsophisticated Indians. The treaty stipulates that they should be paid in coin, and we ought to pay them in coin.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. McBRIDE. I move the following to come in at the end of line six hundred and ninety-nine:

For payment of the claims of the Wyandotte tribe of Indians under the treaties of the year 1842, and January 31, in the year 1855, the sum of $48,786 81.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of the amendment is made up of several distinct items. By the treaty of 1842 the Wyandottes were entitled to an annuity of $17,500 annually. By the treaty of 1855 this annuity was to cease on the payment of the first installment of the amount provided to be paid under the new treaty of that date. That stipulation was not complied with by the Government; about one half of the amount was paid at the time, and some six months afterward the balance was paid. The Indians claim that as their second annuity did not begin at the time agreed upon, the original one is clearly due. The justice of this item, amounting to some eight thousand dollars, so clearly commends itself to every one that I only state the facts and leave it to the judgment of the House.

Another item is for the payment of $1,300, due an annual annuity; it was not paid for a want of appropriation, which was deficient, and it has been suffered to pass along from time to time. There is no question as to both the justice and propriety of this appropriation.

In 1850 there was another treaty made by which a fund of $100,000 was to be invested in United States stocks. In 1855, by a new treaty, the Government agreed to pay them $100,000 in cash instead of these bonds. When called upon for it, instead of paying the cash, they invested $100,000 in Tennessee bonds. The Wyandottes finding that they were unable to get anything else, agreed, under protest, to take the bonds for what they were worth, not at their face. The item I refer to now is for the purpose of making up the difference between the face of those bonds and what they brought in the market.

The fourth item is perhaps a little more questionable, and occurred in this way: by the treaty of 1855 certain lands were reserved and set aside for the Wyandotte Indians, and they were to be exempt from taxation for five years after their territory should be embraced within the bounds of a State government. It seems, however, that the territorial authorities went forward and commenced taxing the lands, and these Indians were compelled to pay it up to the time that the State government of Kansas went into effect. There is no question but that it was a violation of the treaty, and the Department very appropriately have asked for a repayment of this amount to the Wyandottes.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman state why this appropriation has not been brought to the attention of Congress prior to this time, as that claim accrued years ago?

Mr. McBRIDE. I cannot say as to that. The tribe has been urging this claim upon the Government from that time until now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. Under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of 1855 it was provided that instead of the investment made as before provided certain sums therein named and the accumulations of prior investments were to be distributed per capita. The facts, which have been partially explained by the gentleman from Oregon, did not seem to me satisfactorily to make plain the title of the Indians to the sums now demanded, but which accrued years ago, if at all, under the treaty of 1855. While I am not able, in the absence of papers, to explain the discrepancy between the United States and the Indians differently from the gentleman from Oregon, I suggest to him whether it is not far better for his committee to report a bill upon this subject than to put it upon a general appropriation bill which is designed simply to make regular and unquestionable appropriations for Indian tribes. It seems to me to be rather in the nature of a private claim, if I may so call it, which ought not to be attached to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. McBRIDE. As debate is closed on this amendment, I will move another. I move to strike out the last line of the amendment. The gentleman from Iowa doubtless understands why I could not adopt his suggestion. The only result would be, at this stage of the session, to lose the bill. The committee have carefully investigated this matter, and they are satisfied the claim is just, and is entitled to the consideration of the House. The Indians are entitled to this money under the treaty.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. This is a very large sum to attach to an appropriation bill, and I would like some further explanation of an item which constitutes one half the amount of his amendment—that is the item of $30,000. I would like to know by what authority the investment was made.

Mr. McBRIDE. By authority of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Thompson; but it was protested against upon the part of the Indians. They were entitled to $100,000 cash, but the Secretary, instead of paying it in that way, invested it in Tennessee bonds and compelled the Indians to take them. Seeing they could get nothing else, they took them under protest, and upon their sale in the market they failed to bring their face by this amount.

Mr. THAYER. This certainly is an appropriation of such a character and of so large an amount, as to be worthy of more deliberate consideration than can be given upon such an occasion as this; and on that account I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL. I think this claim is an old acquaintance. It has been before Congress heretofore.

Mr. McBRIDE. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sure it has been before Congress heretofore. The amount of the claim is nearly fifty thousand dollars, and a part of it originated more than twenty years ago. We ought to have a full examination of it by the proper Department, and have it sent here in some authorized estimate, so that it can be investigated by the whole House. I trust that at this late period of the session we shall not feel disposed to increase our appropriations by making amendments involving so large an amount where we have had no opportunity to examine it.

Mr. McBRIDE. I desire simply to say that the first item occurred in 1855; and the Indians have been pressing it in their way from that time till now.

Mr. MORRILL. Part of it originated in a treaty before 1855.

Mr. McBRIDE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk having read the paragraph making appropriations for the Arapahoes and Cheyenne Indians of the Upper Arkansas river,

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph. I think that gentlemen connected with the Committee of Ways and Means are not aware of the fact that the great body of these Cheyenne Indians have been slaughtered by Federal troops at the Cheyenne village, and that a bill now lies on the Speaker's table, and has been lying there for the last three or four weeks, proposing to remedy, as far as may be, the barbarities perpetrated on that occasion. It is very singular that we are so prompt in appropriating money to pay these Indian annuities, while we permit the most barbarous and infamous acts of barbarity to be perpetrated upon the Indians without any effort to hold the guilty parties to punishment. These Cheyenne Indians were murdered in cold blood, and for the object of plunder, deliberately murdered while they were under the protection of the Government of the United States, and while their interpreter was sleeping quietly in his tent.

I do think, sir, that in connection with these circumstances, the conduct of this Government is most remarkable. We allow barbarities to pass unnoticed, while we are remarkably prompt in carrying out what seem to be the mere words of our treaty stipulations. I might well insist that the paragraph for the Cheyenne Indians should be struck out, a large majority of them having been murdered in cold blood by the United States troops.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman from Indiana propose, in order to remedy these barbarities, that we shall not live up to our treaty, and not pay what we have stipulated to pay? Is that the way the gentleman would atone for these barbarities?

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as the little remnant of the tribe is concerned, it may be well enough to continue the appropriation. But yet the gentleman from Vermont, and other leading gentlemen on that side of the House, may well blush at the reflection that while we are carrying out these treaty stipulations, we are allowing a Senate bill to lie on the Speaker's table for a month, which is intended to inflict some reasonable degree of punishment on men who have been guilty of wiping out nearly this whole tribe of Indians, under the guns of a United States fort. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentlemen from Indiana has had the opportunity of making his speech. He surely could not have been in earnest in offering his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BROOKS. In regard to the appropriation for the Seminole and Creek Indians I should like to have some assurance that the money is properly disbursed. These Creek Indians are partly in the service of the Government, and receive pay and rations from the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee of Ways and Means has the information on the subject that is contained in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. My understanding of all these appropriations for Seminole and Creek Indians is that the larger portion of them has not been expended. That part that could be made to reach the friendly Indians has been expended, but that which was for the portion of them hostile to the Government remains unexpended. After two years the appropriation lapses and goes back to the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKS. I am content to have a record made of the fact. The gentleman from Vermont supposes that much of this money is unexpended. I think it ought not to be expended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to amend by striking out the following paragraph:

For general incidental expenses of the Indian service in New Mexico, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $50,000.

I find on page 51 an appropriation of $746,000 for the Navajoe Indians of New Mexico, which, with this $50,000, makes about $800,000 for the Indians of New Mexico. This sum is appropriated, not to supply their necessities, but merely to assist them to locate in permanent abodes. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the great numbers of the inevitable negroes that are about us and of the poor white refugees that must be taken care of by the Government, we might refrain from making appropriations to induce the Indians to change their mode of life which they have practiced for centuries.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this appropriation is not to carry out any treaty. I call upon the gentleman from Vermont to state whether there is any law for it.

The SPEAKER. The appropriation is identical with that we made last year.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire merely to say, in response to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the same appropriation for the same purpose was made last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Made last year for the first time.

Mr. MORRILL. Merely as an appropriation. It was formally recommended by the Department, and I think our experience in the western part of the country, on the plains, and in New Mexico and Utah, and various other places, has been that it is far better to expend a sum of money, small in amount compared to that which we would be compelled to expend should we become involved in any Indian wars, such as have been frequent for the last three or four years. It is a mere matter of policy on the part of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. The most serious difficulties we have had with Indian tribes have been with those tribes with whom we have treaty stipulations, and to whom we have paid the money under those treaties, and the most depredations have been committed by those tribes who had no possible cause of complaint. There have been fewer depredations committed by the Indians in New Mexico than by the other tribes. And up to the last session of Congress it never was deemed necessary to make appropriations for their benefit. We have had terribly devastating and bloody wars with the tribes with whom we have had treaty stipulations. So far as that is concerned, we gain nothing by carrying out these treaty stipulations and the payment of this money.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the paragraph is in order, as it is continuing an appropriation which Congress has commenced. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. McBRIDE. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entirely mistaken in regard to this appropriation. He tells the House that there has been no war with Indians in New Mexico. He certainly understands very little of the history of that portion of our country when he makes such a statement as that. I have been informed by the Delegate from New Mexico, [Mr. PEREA,] that ever since the settlement of that Territory, Arapahoe Indians have been the constant foes of the settlers there. Something less than a year ago the military commandant of that department succeeded in capturing a large mass of the Indians and bringing them into the reserve where they have been held by the military at the expense of the Government. It seems to me that there can be no question as to the propriety of this appropriation. The Government must expend the amount either through the military Department of the Government or through the legitimate department of Indian affairs.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. TOWNSEND to strike out the paragraph, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN raised the point of order in relation to the appropriation for the Indians lately residing in Texas, that it was not an appropriation authorized by law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to strike out the following paragraph:

Indian service in the district of country leased from the Choctaws for the Indians lately residing in Texas.

For the expenses of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing agricultural implements and stock, pay of necessary employes, purchase of clothing, medicines, iron, and steel, and maintenance of schools for Indians lately residing in Texas, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $22,825.

I would not move or vote to strike out anything which I believed would really benefit these Indians. I have felt that they have been and probably are now wronged by us, and I do not believe that a large sum of money appropriated for miscellaneous purposes, for schools, for medicines, &c., for the Indians lately residing in Texas, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, will do the Indians any good. I believe that the money appropriated for this purpose is merely plundered by interested parties. Therefore I think we should not make these appropriations. There is no treaty, no law, no obligation on our part which requires us to appropriate this money. I shall be glad to be corrected; but from all I can learn, these appropriations do the Indians no good. A set of men hang about these Indians for the purpose of getting this money, under the pretense of keeping schools for the Indians lately in Texas, and now the Lord knows where. I think we should strike out this appropriation, unless the Committee on Indian Affairs or some member acquainted with the subject will show that it is likely to be of some service to these wronged people.

Mr. KASSON. The pending paragraph reads, "Indian service in the district of country leased from the Choctaws for the Indians lately residing in Texas." It thus appears that a contract has been made by the Government with the Choctaws for the purpose of providing for these Texas Indians upon their reservation. It is well known that the Choctaws are very intelligent and very well educated for Indians. This proposition is simply to extend to those who are now located upon a part of this Choctaw reservation the same opportunity for improvement and education which is now extended to the Indians living there. I hope this paragraph will not be stricken out, unless the burden of proof is assumed by those who oppose it, to show that it is not for the benefit of the Indians. The presumption is certainly in favor of carrying out what has become the established policy of the Government. Wherever this bill proceeds upon the recommendations of the Department for carrying out that policy it is, I think, not only within the rule, as the Speaker has decided, but it carries with it the presumption of propriety in carrying out the system which has been established for the protection and education of these Indian tribes who are thus taken from roving warfare and introduced to the peaceful pursuits of civilization.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend by reducing the amount of the appropriation to $10,000. Now, I would ask whether existing treaties do not provide for the expenditure of whatever we ought to expend. Will these Indians get the benefit of any gratuity which we may appropriate?

Now, sir, with what we now know in reference to the expenditures of these moneys among the Indians, I think that the burden of proof is not on those who propose to strike out a miscellaneous appropriation for schools among roving Indians. We should not, it appears to me, vote for any appropriation unless some committee of the House or some member can show either that we are bound by treaty to make the appropriation or that it will really do good to those for whom the appropriation is made. We have not the money to give away. I admit that we can provide for no more deserving class than these Indians; and if I thought that this appropriation would benefit the Indians, such is my feeling in reference to their wrongs, from all that I have ever read or heard, that I would vote for the appropriation. But I do not believe that it will benefit them. The rule, I think, should be, not that we should vote everything asked unless we can show it to be wrong, but that we should vote for no proposition unless some committee or some member can give us facts to justify our vote.

Mr. WILSON. The first portion of this paragraph provides for "the expenses of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing agricultural implements," &c. This, I am informed, is the second time that this appropriation has been embraced in the Indian appropriation bill. I presume that the Indians by this time are colonized.

Mr. KASSON. My colleague will allow me to state one additional fact. I understand these Indians to be those who were in Texas at the opening of the war, and who were obliged either to escape from the rebels or to join them. They therefore fall within the class of refugee Indians for whom we have been obliged to provide homes, and who have been provided for in the manner named. The colonizing goes on as the refugee Indians come from any part of Texas.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the withholding of this appropriation will induce these Indians to go back into Texas. If it will, I will vote against the appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the great body of these Indians are colonized by this time, and as we last year appropriated the same amount now proposed, for colonizing them, furnishing them with agricultural implements, &c., I think that we may properly reduce the appropriation somewhat this year. It certainly will not cost as much this year to buy the agricultural implements as it cost last year to colonize the Indians and buy the agricultural implements. Therefore, if the gentleman from New York will withdraw his amendment I will move to reduce the appropriation to $15,000.

Mr. MORRILL. As we are not in possession of accurate information as to the precise manner in which this money is expended, I trust that we may have some faith in the Department that it is expending no more than is necessary. I suppose that some portion of this amount is expended for the purpose of paying the Choctaws for the lease of these lands; how much I do not know.

Mr. WILSON. As the gentleman desires that we shall base our votes upon faith in the Indian Department, I should like to know whether he can inform us of any unexpended balances on any of the appropriations that we have made for the purposes of that Department. I think that all the money we appropriate departs from the Treasury in some way or other, and if we appropriate $50,000 instead of $22,000 somebody will get it, and that if we appropriate $10,000 instead of $22,000 the Indians will derive just as much benefit.

Mr. WILSON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN's motion to strike out the section was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the Wichitas and other affiliated bands.

For the expense of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing said bands with agricultural implements and stock, pay of necessary employes, purchase of clothing, medicines, iron, steel, and maintenance of schools, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $37,800.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reduce the appropriation to $20,000. I do that for the same reason I have already stated. It is an appropriation of the nature of the one we reduced. It is for the colonization and support of Indians. I am opposed to annual colonizations. I would rather have it fixed for two or three years. I think that we would then save money. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BROOKS. There are about two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars appropriated by this bill, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for this sort of purpose, without the authority of law. I have read the report of the Secretary of the Interior and I do not think that many here have read it. The main ideas of that report have been introduced in this bill. It is the beginning of a new policy, and I think it ought to be considered in a bill. The policy of the Secretary of the Interior is to colonize and take care of these Indians. He thinks that it is a wise policy and will obviate all existing difficulties, and I am willing to consider it. I do not think that this is the proper time, or that the proper place is in this bill. As we progress with the bill we will find other items of a like character.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California, including traveling expenses of the superintending agents, $7,500.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to strike that out and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For expenses of Indian service in California already incurred, $7,500.

Mr. Speaker, I receive by every mail from California letters from persons who have furnished supplies to these Indians, some to the Indian agents under fair contracts, and who have not been paid. Women who have been teaching Indian children have not been paid for a year past. It seems impossible for these parties to secure the compensation they are entitled to. It seems that there has been no possibility of obtaining it up to this time. I leave it discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior to make the disbursement of this appropriation for the benefit of those who have rendered this service.

Mr. MORRILL. If that appropriation is proper at all it should be made in the deficiency bill. I would suggest that the gentleman withhold the amendment until we have that bill before us. This bill appropriates for 1866, while the amendment is for 1865.

Mr. COLE, of California. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. I would like to know what are the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California. It seems to me that it is a miscellaneous mode of appropriating money unless we know something about it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams and farming tools for Indians in California, $55,000.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike that out. It is the inauguration of a new policy of dealing with these Indians. We propose to purchase beef, milk, and clothing for Indians in California.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. A similar appropriation was made at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. The experience we have had with beef contracts in the Army I think ought to cause us to hesitate before we continue appropriations of this character. And buying milk for Indians! I have heard of it as food for babes before but never as food for Indians. I hope the item will be stricken out, and that we shall stop the policy altogether.

Mr. SHANNON. Then we ought to repeal the law for the reservation.

Mr. WILSON. There is nothing in that law about beef and milk.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to know of the gentleman from Vermont whether this item is to carry out a treaty stipulation?

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman that this item is of the same character as those which have already been reduced on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

The first appropriation made for a similar object was last year. It was then deemed the soundest policy to be adopted by the Government in relation to the Indians in California to make these appropriations in a specific manner, and thereby save the Treasury from a vast expenditure such as we have had to bear for the last six or eight years in the Pacific States.

It is for the House to decide whether they will drop this policy and run the risk of having the country involved in a much greater expenditure for the same object upon the part of the Indians.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I prefer to hold on to this $55,000 and take the chances. I hope that will be stricken out.

Mr. SHANNON. I hope it will not be stricken out. To enable me to make what remarks I desire to submit, I move to strike out the last clause of the paragraph.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Will the gentleman tell us what necessity there is for this appropriation? If he can satisfy us of the necessity for this appropriation, I shall vote for it.

Mr. SHANNON. That is what I rose for the purpose of doing. The Government has established reservations, and collected the Indians upon them, and they must now feed them or turn them out. I have no doubt that if the $55,000 is appropriated, and honestly and faithfully laid out and invested in beef, the Indians will appreciate that beef very much, particularly if they are hungry. And I have no doubt that they would like to have milk in their coffee, if necessary. I have no doubt that in the mountainous portions of the country, if they are very cold, and have no clothing, and they are furnished with blankets, they will sleep much more comfortably than they would sleep without them. Is that satisfactory to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON?] [Laughter.] These are self-evident propositions which I do not propose to elaborate here. And you can do just as you please. [Laughter.] You can feed these Indians in accordance with a scheme already established, and according to a contract made with the Indians who have been taken from their homes and placed under the charge of the Government. You can either carry out that contract, and supply them with those necessary materials until they are able to sustain themselves, or you can turn them out, and refuse to give them anything, and fight them. And then you will have a bill here for $555,000 for fighting those Indians, and my friends in the rear, from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] and Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will no doubt vote to pay that sum instead of $55,000. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEBSTER. If I understand the gentleman, this is a proposition to improve the diet of the Indians in California, for the purpose of improving their manners and morals. My idea is that his argument is an improper one.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman will understand me that I intended to convey the idea that you could feed them cheaper than you can fight them.

Mr. WEBSTER. I understand that the diet of these Indians heretofore has been crab-worms and roots. Now, the gentleman seems to think that if you give them milk and beef they will need blankets to cover their nakedness. The gentleman makes a mistake upon that question. It is a fact known to everybody that the more beef you eat the more you will fight, and he therefore desires to make these Indians a fighting race. The gentleman from New York, too, thinks that this milk diet has some fighting quality in it.

Mr. KERNAN. I think I have discovered that this provision for milk is to purchase that which a man said would not go far where there was no milch cow in the family.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman laid down the proposition that the more beef a man eats the more he feels like fighting. Upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland I have no doubt of that, because they get very little good beef there. It is just the reverse in our State.

Mr. WEBSTER. Not coming from that part of Maryland called the Eastern Shore, the gentleman who represents that district [Mr. CRESWELL] will take this allusion very unkind of him; but I will say this, that upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland it is not beef but oysters, terrapins, and canvas-back ducks which make our people equal to the beef-eaters of California.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate be closed upon this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out the paragraph, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the compensation of five extra clerks, employed in the Indian Office under the act of 5th August, 1854, and 3d March, 1855, and under appropriations made from year to year, $7,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire what these extra clerks are employed upon.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that these clerks were authorized under various appropriation bills, and that some of them have been continued, but not for the purpose for which they were originally provided. In relation to this item, the paragraph itself shows what the appropriation is for.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What I want to know is what services they perform.

Mr. NELSON. I think I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to get some information from the gentleman from Vermont in regard to the service of these clerks. I do not know but that it may be proper to make this appropriation, but I propose an amendment providing that these extra clerks shall not be employed after the 1st of January next, unless specially provided for by law.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that the Secretary of the Interior is very anxious to have Congress legislate upon this subject.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That the said extra clerks shall not be employed after the 1st day of January, 1866, unless specially provided for by law.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to make a statement to the gentleman from Illinois. I have taken occasion to read a great many of the treaties made with the Indian tribes, but I confess that I have read none of them in which the "poor Indian" was not cheated. The gentleman asks about the duties of these clerks. I find upon the files of the Indian Office assignment after assignment, and I have no doubt that it is necessary to have four, five, or perhaps ten clerks to fill the record of assignments of claims, even while pending in Congress.

Now, I think that if the gentleman from Illinois will look into this subject he will agree with me. I have no doubt that every one of these clerks is necessary. The duties of the office seem to be very onerous and burdensome.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will modify my amendment by substituting the 30th of June, 1866, for the 1st of January, 1866.

The amendment proposed by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the following clause:

For compensation of one clerk in the Indian Office, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the regulations prescribed to give effect to the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1855, granting bounty lands to Indians, §1,400.

By adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the said clerk shall not be employed after the 30th day of June, 1866, unless specially provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to insert after line eleven hundred and seventy-one the words:

Provided, That said extra clerks shall not be employed after the 30th day of June, 1866, unless specially provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Oregon and Washington Territory, including insurance and transportation of annuity goods and presents, (where no special provision therefor is made by treaties,) and office traveling expenses of the superintendent and sub-agents, $35,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire what that means—"office traveling expenses."

Mr. MORRILL. I think that must be improperly printed; it is a very trifling matter anyhow.

Mr. STEVENS. The word "and" between the words "office" and "traveling expenses," seems to have been omitted.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert the word "and" before the word "office."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reduce this appropriation to $30,000. I do it for the purpose of inquiring from the gentleman from Vermont whether there has been any treaty with the Indians in Oregon and Washington.

Mr. MORRILL. I would say in response to the gentleman that I am not aware of the existence of any such treaty; but this appropriation is in pursuance of the policy adopted last year.

Mr. WILSON. I understand all that. What I want to know is whether we have any treaty stipulations with these Indians, and if so whether there is any necessity for this additional appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] is on the Indian Committee. Perhaps he can explain.

Mr. McBRIDE. I will strive to do so. The object of this appropriation is to take care of Indians with whom treaties were made in 1855. Those treaties were never ratified. The Indians were removed from their own lands to reservations, and have been there sustained by appropriations similar to this from that time until now. No treaty stipulation actually exists with them, although they are being taken care of by the Government.

Mr. WILSON. Do they receive nothing from the Government under treaty?

Mr. McBRIDE. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I wish the gentleman from Oregon would state where these reservations are located, how far they are apart, and what amount of traveling this superintendent will have to do in order to discharge his duty.

Mr. McBRIDE. The superintendent lives at the capital of the State. The reservation is fifty or sixty miles distant.

Mr. WILSON. That is a very convenient way, sir.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman from Oregon how many Indians there are in that State.

Mr. McBRIDE. I cannot inform the gentleman.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I understand there are but seven or eight thousand Indians in the State of Oregon, and between thirty and forty thousand in the Territory of Washington. I believe, from the records which I have examined, that treaties have been made with every tribe of Indians in the State of Oregon, that there are agents there taking care of these Indians, and that appropriations have been made for the support and subsistence of these Indians so far as Oregon is concerned.

Mr. WILSON. Inasmuch as my colleague [Mr. HUBBARD] cannot state the circumstances in regard to the Indians in Washington Territory, I move to amend by reducing the appropriation from $35,000 to $25,000.

Mr. McBRIDE. I have only to repeat what I said before, that these Indians were taken from their lands and located by the Government under a treaty made with them. The Government, however, failed to perform its part of the contract, and now, instead of receiving the annuities which they expected to receive, and which the Government stipulated to pay them, they are simply being subsisted at the expense of the Government on these reservations.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, that cannot possibly be true, or the Committee of Ways and Means has mistaken the facts in preparing this bill, for there is an appropriation for certain expenses, including insurance and transportation of annuity goods and presents. Annuity goods, I understand, are provided in pursuance of treaties between the Government and the Indians.

Mr. McBRIDE. I think I can explain that also. Some of the treaties with the Indians were ratified, and these appropriations for them seem to have been expended by the Department.

Mr. WILSON. When were the treaties ratified?

Mr. McBRIDE. I do not know when they were ratified.

Mr. WILSON. This is only the continuance of a mode of appropriation which has not been changed although treaties have been made with these Indians.

Mr. McBRIDE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, for I have been urging on the Government ever since I have been here to make new treaties with these Indians or to ratify the old ones.

Mr. WILSON. Well, this appropriation is wrong.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, the way I understand this matter is this: the Government undertook to make treaties with these Indians, and, in pursuance of them, took possession of their lands. The Government afterward failed to ratify most of the treaties, and kept the lands; and now it is proposed to keep the money.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain that provision of the appropriation which provides for the appropriation of annuity goods. How are we to deliver annuity goods unless in pursuance of treaty stipulations?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman must have understood me to say that most of the treaties were not ratified. Some of them were, but most of them were not.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by striking out all but the last word. I rise for the purpose of saying that I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will not prevail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES.) The Chair is informed that there is but one word in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Then I move to strike out a part of that word. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] will proceed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I believe the Indians, not only those on the western coast, but also those all through the country, have been already defrauded sufficiently by the white people of the country, and even by the Government itself, and I hope that at this day Congress will not set the example of imposing further upon the Indian tribes which have suffered so much at our hands. I do not know of any Indians in any part of the country who have suffered more than the poor defenseless tribes of Oregon and Washington. They have been warred upon mercilessly by the whites. White speculators, traders, men who have not the interests of the Indians at heart, have been there to deprive them of their substance and drive them from their lands; and they are now on reservations away from the lands where they were originally located; upon lands appropriated to them by the Government, under promise of subsidies and annuities.

Now, if there be anything expressed or implied on the part of the Government in relation to supplies or annuities, we are bound in good faith and honesty to see that the promises of the Government are fulfilled. I say there is a promise; and if the Government of this country has taken these Indians from the lands where they once lived happily and placed them on lands in reservation, then I say that there is a moral promise on the part of the Government to pay them something to maintain them upon the lands to which they have been removed. It is unfair and unjust in us to take away what the policy and beneficence of this Government has hitherto given them. It is shown here that year after year we have made a similar appropriation to this, which now, in this spirit of false economy, we propose to take away.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to terminate all debate on this paragraph.

The motion was not seconded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] is laboring under a misapprehension in regard to this paragraph. It has nothing to do with appropriations to Indians. It is for the general expense of the Indian service in Oregon, including insurance and transportation of annuity goods and presents, where no special provision is made therefor by treaties, and office and traveling expenses of the superintendent and sub-agents, $35,000. Now what I complain of in this whole matter is, that this Indian bill, instead of making appropriations for carrying out treaty stipulations, is introducing new matter in making these various appropriations. Here is $35,000 not for the benefit of the Indians; the Indians get no sort of advantage from these appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL. If we have annuities and goods to carry to the Indians, how can they be benefited by them if we retain them here, and do not send them there?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is provided for by treaty. But this goes on to provide for all matters not provided for by treaty. You propose to appropriate the sum of $35,000. I undertake to say the great proportion of this sum will go into the hands of this superintendent and these sub-agents.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I renew the amendment.

I have no doubt of the truth of all that has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] as to the Indians of this country having been wronged and defrauded in almost every conceivable way. But I also believe that the proper method of making reparation to the Indians does not consist in granting these general appropriations to be expended in the discretion of the Indian Department; for, Mr. Speaker, either that department is the worst-abused bureau in the whole Government, or it is the most corrupt. Every gentleman with whom I have conversed, who has had any knowledge of the way in which the Indians are treated, of the way in which appropriations for their benefit are expended, of the manner in which the annuities are paid to them, even under treaty stipulations where the amount and the kind of goods are specified, has expressed the belief that the Indians are almost invariably wronged and in some way defrauded of a large part of these goods; that a considerable portion never reaches them; and of the amount that they do receive, the agents of the Government, through their friends and tools, succeed in defrauding them of a large portion.

I believe, therefore, that we should not make these general appropriations, to be expended by the Indian department in its discretion, how and where it pleases, but should insert some provision which will secure the payment to the Indians of the money and the delivery of the property which we design for them, and some provision under which the department will be required to furnish accounts and proofs to the proper committees of Congress that the Indians are fairly and honestly dealt with. I believe that there ought to be a radical change in our policy in relation to the Indian tribes, a thorough reorganization of the department which now has charge of this subject, and that the House ought to put its condemnation upon this system of voting general appropriations to be expended under the discretion of any officer of the Government. These Indians are in distant parts of the country. Even if the department itself intends to administer the law with entire honesty, and to treat them with justice, it is obliged to depend upon agents who are beyond the confines of civilization, who are beyond the reach of our laws, whom it is almost impossible to hold to a strict accountability, because evidence of their improper transactions cannot be obtained. I believe that these general appropriations ought to be stricken from this bill, that a specific appropriation for each particular tribe or party of Indians should be made, and that the department should be required to prove in each case, by two respectable witnesses who are not Indian agents or connected with the service, that the money and property appropriated is actually received by the Indians or expended for their benefit.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of their Clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which they requested the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 452) to incorporate the Capitol Hotel Company, in Washington city, District of Columbia.

An act (S. No. 463) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads of said State,'" and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 473) to extend the time for constructing the Burlington and Missouri River railroad in Iowa, and filing a map of relocation.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 543) to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, with amendments, in which they requested the concurrence of the House:

An act (H. R. No. 600) for the reorganization of the subsistence department; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, all that has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] may be true. I have no knowledge of the fact that corruption exists in the Indian department; but if I had knowledge, as the gentleman seems to have, of the utter rottenness and corruption of that department—

Mr. SLOAN. I did not say that I had knowledge of such corruption; I said that the general belief among all those with whom I had conversed was that such corruption existed.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman certainly asserted that it was the general belief; and I understood him to indorse that belief. Now, sir, if I believed, as he believes, that that department is rotten to the core, that it is robbing the Indians as well as the Government, I should certainly have deemed it my duty long ago to ask for a committee of investigation to examine into the facts. That would have appeared to me as a solemn duty which I owed to this Government, a duty which I could not neglect without violence to my own conscience. But to stick here until the last week of the session and say not one word on the subject, neither to detect the frauds nor to give the department an opportunity to vindicate itself, it seems to me to be great injustice to that department. To condemn it unheard and to give it no opportunity of being heard, is what certainly does not become this House.

How, indeed, if fraud be suspected, are we to make a correction by withholding this appropriation? These goods must be delivered to these Indians or they will starve or go into insurrection.

We know the immense cost of transportation in that western country, from this side of the river and up the Missouri, for we examined that subject at the last session of Congress. We found that the freight cost three or four times as much as the original price of the goods if we deliver them on the other side. And shall these appropriations, with nothing but clamor against them, be cut off? It would be unjust. It may be that these men are corrupt. It may be that these Indians have been cheated. I admit that they have been cheated from the time the first Pilgrim landed upon the continent until this day; that treaties have been shams; and that wars upon the part of white men have been mere murders; but all that is no reason why we should now withhold these appropriations to carry out the policy established by this Government. The slaughter of the men, women, and children of that country would be the result.

I hope, sir, that we will not be led away. I hope that my friend will get up an investigating committee and have this matter thoroughly examined.

Mr. MORRILL. We are anxious to get a vote on this bill to-night, and if possible to act on the Navy appropriation bill; and I again move that debate be closed on the pending paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The question then recurred on Mr. WILSON's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. SHANNON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the clause in reference to California was stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. We are now acting as in Committee of the Whole, and the motion to reconsider is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. SHANNON. I do not.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For defraying the expenses of the removal and subsistence of Indians in Oregon and Washington Territory, (not payable to any treaty,) and for pay of necessary employes, $50,000.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reduce that to $25,000. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this is the third time that this appropriation has appeared in an appropriation bill. It is the same amount and for the same purpose, defraying the expenses of the removal and subsistence of Indians. It is another set of Indians upon wheels. [Laughter.] The Government keeps removing them. We do not permit them to rest at all. Fifty thousand dollars a year is expended in their constant removal. Now, it does seem to me that before we appropriate another $50,000 the committee should be able to tell us how much it cost the first year to remove these Indians, and then we can deduct that and leave the rest for subsistence. I think it would cost about one half, and I have made the deduction accordingly.

Mr. McBRIDE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman seems to be acting on a single idea, and that is to reduce the appropriation. His action is not based upon any knowledge of what he is doing.

The gentleman says that this is for the removal of Indians, and has appeared in the appropriation bills before. That is true; but the previous appropriations do not necessarily apply to the same Indians. Every year treaties are being made with Indians and they are being removed to reservations. In some cases they have no annuities, and we are compelled to subsidize them. The policy of the department has been, as fast as they can get the control of the Indians, to place them upon reservations. These Indians are merely subsidized at the expense of the Government. I hope that the gentleman will not be permitted to cut off their supplies.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to cut off their supplies; but I do propose to reduce this to what I believe to be a proper amount. As the gentleman has questioned my information, of course he should know more than I do. I would like him to tell us how many tribes were removed in Oregon the first year, year before last, for which this appropriation was made; how many tribes last year; and how many are to be removed hereafter.

Mr. McBRIDE. I cannot inform the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. Then the gentleman has no more information than I have.

Mr. McBRIDE. I have some and the gentleman has none.

Mr. WILSON. I wish he would give us some information, for I certainly have not received any.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says it costs too much to educate us here. I presume it does; for I have noticed that whenever an attempt upon the part of members of this House to cut down appropriations is made, and when we seek to get information to enable us to see whether appropriations should or should not be reduced, we find them maintained by the Committee of Ways and Means in spite of all the efforts made to reduce them, and they are maintained by the Committee of Ways and Means not always with the best of reasons. Now, I ask the Committee of Ways and Means to tell us how many of these Indians were removed last year, how many year before last, and how many still remain to be removed.

Mr. McBRIDE. I know that this appropriation is considerably less than the estimates of former years. There has been an unexpended balance remaining in the Treasury.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Oregon tells us there was an unexpended balance remaining over, and yet we are asked to appropriate the same amount we appropriated last year and the year before, from which appropriations this unexpended balance has accrued.

The question recurring upon the motion to strike out, and there being, on a division, no quorum voting,

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WILSON and J. C. ALLEN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. If it is in order I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with leave to report at any time when they shall have made themselves sufficiently familiar with the bill to explain its provisions. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHANNON. That would amount to an indefinite postponement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) In the opinion of the Chair it is in order to move to recommit, but so much of the gentleman's motion as is of a general character is not in order.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHANNON. I have no doubt that the House, in merely playful good-humor, voted out the appropriation for the California Indians, on page 48; and if it is in order, I move to reconsider the vote by which that paragraph appropriating $55,000 was stricken out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. This bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where a motion to reconsider is not entertained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is impossible, by the order that this bill should be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole, that the House should be deprived of the power of reconsidering its action.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HIGBY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. SHANNON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will, of course.

Mr. SHANNON. I want that vote reconsidered in order that I may present the question to the House once more, to see whether they really intend to cut off that appropriation or not. There is no question but that some appropriation should be made in order to prevent an Indian war there which would cost hundreds and thousands of dollars for every one here refused to be voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will say that this is an appropriation to carry out an existing law, I will vote with him.

Mr. SHANNON. It is in conformity to a state of things which has existed there for years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was there any treaty under which this is claimed? Wherever there is a treaty requiring an appropriation this bill expressly says so, and points out the treaty itself. This is an appropriation of $55,000 for the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams and farming tools, for the Indians in California—a mere general appropriation.

Mr. SHANNON. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Indiana that we have no formal treaty, but we have an agreement and understanding which amounts to the same thing. Under the existing system established by the Government these Indians are collected upon the reservations with a promise of being maintained, and that system must be abandoned and the Indians turned loose if you fail to appropriate any money.

Mr. HIGBY. The condition of our Indian affairs is simply this: the Government has set apart a large tract of land and gone to a great expense for the purpose of taking care of the Indians. Upon these lands the Indians reside. A part of the land is devoted by them to agricultural purposes, and upon the remainder they fish and hunt; and in those two ways they obtain a livelihood. The Government has wisely pursued the course of setting apart lands, gathering the Indians upon them as much as possible, and making an annual appropriation toward their maintenance. The Indians have been kept so for a number of years. Up to last year there were three reservations, but by the legislation of last session they were reduced to two. If they are to be left without any means they will, as has been said, be turned loose, and the consequence will be an Indian war, and the blood of the white man will be shed as it has been heretofore. Following upon that, of course, would be the necessity of sending a large military force to look after them; and that will create the necessity for a very much larger appropriation than is asked for here.

I cannot say whether this amount is the right one to be appropriated, but that something should be appropriated is imperatively necessary, and I trust this House will not allow this bill to pass without including such an appropriation in it.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from California if he does not think that one half of this amount would be sufficient.

Mr. HIGBY. I will say to the gentleman in all frankness that I do not know what amount should be appropriated. I do not know whether it should be one third; one half, or the whole of the amount. But that some appropriation is necessary for this purpose I have not the least hesitation in saying.

The question was taken on Mr. SHANNON's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the vote striking out the paragraph was reconsidered.

The question recurred on the motion to strike out the following paragraph:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams, and farming tools, for Indians in California, $55,000.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the paragraph by reducing the amount to $30,000.

Mr. SHANNON. Make it $40,000.

Mr. WILSON. Let it stand at $30,000.

Mr. SHANNON. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $40,000.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say since this subject has been up, that I concur, on specific information from the Department, with the views and representations made by the gentlemen from Oregon and California respectively.

I find that there are about four thousand Indians on certain reservations in California named by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his report. He goes into details and furnishes the reports of the sub-agents. He shows the policy that has been adopted, points out its advantages, and proposes to continue that policy by the concentration of the roving Indians. He gives in detail all the information which any man can expect to get from a report, showing the beneficial results of the policy adopted recently in the management of Indians. He also discusses the effect of the act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California, under which all these appropriations have been made establishing that policy. And when we recollect that, as late as June last we had an Indian war in California, I submit to gentlemen in all seriousness whether it is safe for us in this House to provoke a renewal of the war, and an extension of it, by refusing appropriations to those Indians.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask my colleague if he can state to the House whether there is or is not an unexpended balance remaining over from the appropriation of last year, or of the year before last.

Mr. KASSON. There is no unexpended balance. This is the identical amount that was appropriated before; and they have become accustomed to this amount being appropriated for this specific purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And it makes no difference whether most of it is stolen or not.

Mr. KASSON. Indian wars are often prevented by the fact that some of the money is stolen. The Senate of the United States has even, by a secret article, added to one of its treaties, expressly provided for a certain payment, which the Indians themselves are not to be made acquainted with. Any man who knows the mode of managing these Indians in the western country knows that certain men control hundreds of Indians; and if we can buy such men, as we sometimes can, as low as one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars, there is no person acquainted with the conduct of our Indian affairs who would not justify us in securing them by buying them up. This system has been established and repeatedly acted upon, and any sudden or marked change in the conduct of affairs will tend to produce war with these Indians.

Mr. SHANNON. I desire to say that my colleague is mistaken in stating there were but two reservations. There are three: one recently established near the Oregon line, in Klamath county, another in Hoopa valley, in the mountainous region of country, and another in Round valley, in Coast range.

Mr. HIGBY. I will ask my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] if the number of reservations was not reduced last year. I so understood from the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. They were collected together last year. But one of the tribes, living upon this side of some mountains there, was taken over toward the Pacific ocean to a new reservation fixed there, upon which this appropriation was made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment, and I hope this House will adhere to the appropriation of $55,000.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. WILSON to reduce the appropriation from $55,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion to strike out the paragraph was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to add the words "payable in coin" to the following paragraph:

For payment of interest on $1,699,300, non-paying stock held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for various Indian tribes, up to and including the interest payable July 1, 1866, $416,433 50.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know but this amendment should be adopted, as it comes from a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. As we cannot get that committee to cut down the appropriations, we may be able to help them increase them.

Mr. MORRILL. The habit of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has become chronic on every occasion that is proper or improper, to come before this House and endeavor to stab the Committee of Ways and Means. He appears disposed to do so. I undertake to say that the questions which that gentleman has propounded here on several occasions to the Committee of Ways and Means have been utterly preposterous, and he has no right to complain that they were not answered. There is no man in this House, however robust he may be in constitution, and however great may be his intelligence, who could undertake to master all the infinite details in relation to every appropriation bill. He might as well undertake to ask us how many stones have been already put into the foundation of a fort when an appropriation for the completion of such fort is under consideration, as to ask some of the questions which the gentleman has asked, and when he undertakes to stigmatize the whole of the Committee of Ways and Means as being in favor of the largest expenditures, and always going for the largest sums. For one I protest against it as being untrue in point of fact. There are members of this House belonging to the Committee of Ways and Means who are as truly economical as the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON]—though the smallest sum is not always the truest economy—and for one I am not disposed to submit to these constant and repeated attempts to—I will not say blackguard the Committee of Ways and Means, but to undermine the confidence of the House, by leading them to suppose that the committee have not given sufficient attention to these appropriation bills.

Now, in relation to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAULS]. I will say that as the Department has not asked that these sums be paid in coin I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment so as to provide that one half the amount shall be payable in coin.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] neither does justice to himself nor to me. I have not blackguarded the Committee of Ways and Means, and I have no disposition to do so. I never indulge in such things. But I do assert here now, as I have asserted on many other occasions, that this House is not able to get from the Committee of Ways and Means that information in relation to their bills, especially appropriation bills, to which we are entitled. I said on a former occasion that I had no disposition to charge that the committee do not do all that they can to inform themselves; nor do I make that charge now. I know, as every member of this House knows, that the Committee of Ways and Means has labored more diligently probably than any other committee; but I know also that the members of committees cannot possibly inform themselves as to the details of all their measures; and what I have said during this session of Congress in regard to that committee and in regard to the information that we get from them, has been for the purpose of fixing upon the minds of members of this House the necessity of organizing at least three committees that shall have charge of that business the extent of which now renders it impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means to so inform themselves as to enlighten the House upon every matter of detail in the bills that they report. My remarks on this subject have been prompted by no ill-will or unkind feeling toward any member of that committee, but by a conviction that the best interests of the country demand that the business of that committee shall be divided among several committees, in order to secure that completeness of investigation of that multitude of important subjects affecting every interest of the country which now all go to the Committee of Ways and Means that will enable the House to act understandingly. That is what I have in view.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. To illustrate the fact that the efforts of the gentleman have not been with the view to obtain information, but for the purpose of carrying some other measure than that which he has mentioned, let me call his attention to two prominent instances in which he has called upon the Committee of Ways and Means for information, and then complained that he has not obtained it.

On one occasion he called upon the Committee of Ways and Means to give information as to the precise amount which had been paid out to all the assessors of internal revenue throughout the United States. Now, does any one suppose that it would be possible for any member of this House to have that information in his possession? Why, sir, the question itself was not designed for the purpose of being answered. And now on this occasion he asks us to give to the House information as to the precise number of Indians out in Oregon who have been removed from year to year! There is not a reasonable man in the House who supposes that that information is on any record or in the possession of any member of this House.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not stated either of those facts correctly. In the first place, I did not ask the committee to state to this House how much was paid to every assessor in the United States. My question, as he will find by referring to the Globe, was this: what is the highest sum received, or that can be received by any assessor or collector in any district in the United States? I did not make the inquiry which he now states.

Again, sir, I did not call upon the committee to inform this House as to the precise number of Indians in Oregon. I asked for the number of tribes; that is all; and it does seem to me that it was not an improper question. And I must say this—notwithstanding my remarks seem to have excited the gentlemen on that committee—that I do not believe that I ought to be shut off from seeking information on the subjects coming before us for action because the gentleman from Vermont gets angry and exhibits his temper on such occasions. I believe that it is a duty which I owe to the country, and I intend to discharge it to the best of my ability, either to bring out the information or to show that there should be some reform in the rules of this House whereby we may be enabled to get that which we cannot now get. Now, sir, whether gentlemen like it or not, I expect to pursue this course until it shall secure, if possible, an amendment of the rules, so that we can have the various committees required for the proper examination of the subjects coming before the House, organized and charged with their appropriate duties.

Mr. STEVENS. I am opposed to this amendment, because I do not want any coin paid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I care but very little what anybody may say about the Committee of Ways and Means or any of its members. But there can be no doubt at all that there has been, during this session, a studied determination in certain quarters to disparage and malign, so far as possible, the action of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] justifies his course upon very strange ground. When has any member of the Committee of Ways and Means ever objected to reforming the rules? When has the question ever been before this House? and when has any member of this committee ever said that the change proposed would not be palatable to him? Sir, I have not seen it. I cannot believe but that the gentleman is laboring under a hallucination, and that he believes he was actuated by one motive when he was actuated by another and a different one.

As to the Committee of Ways and Means, we do not pretend to be omniscient; we do not pretend to be able to answer every question connected with the whole legislation of the country.

We had hoped that other members would deem it to be their duty, while the Committee of Ways and Means were laboring as well as they could to inform themselves, to make an effort to learn something, and not deem that it was necessary to be "crammed" by the Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.] It is not to be expected that we should constantly stuff their heads with ideas. That, however, seems to be considered the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means. Gentlemen sit here in supreme indifference and supreme ignorance, and then rise in their places and ask questions the answers to which may be found in the books. They ask us to decide for the whole of them instead of learning for themselves. I had hoped that these men would try and inform their own minds. I do not think from what I have seen that it would hurt them to look a little for themselves into the legislation of the country, and inform their own minds of the things that are going on.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw my amendment, and move to reduce it to one third.

Mr. Speaker, I understand very well how dangerous it is to come into contact with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I know, sir, that very few members of this House dare do it; but while it is not a thing which I desire by any means, I shall not shrink from it, notwithstanding it may bring me in contact with the acknowledged power and ability of that gentleman. I will, as a Representative of the people, in spite of that power and ability, do my duty to the best of my capacity, and not stop to ask his pleasure.

The gentleman speaks about the duty of members informing themselves, and that they should not expect to be "crammed" with the information which the Committee of Ways and Means may have collected. Well, sir, I do not expect to be "crammed" by the committee, and no member need fear such a result in any case; and I have taken the pains on more than one occasion to inform myself in relation to matters coming from that committee, and when propounding questions to the committee I have received anything but an indication of a disposition to furnish the information they were calculated to draw out for the instruction of the House; and almost every member has had more or less of this experience as a reward for his pains.

I repeat what I said before, that my course was based upon what I regarded to be my duty, to bring about a reform in this House, demanded by the highest interests of the public business. The gentleman says that no member of the committee has opposed it. I have not said that opposition rests with the Committee of Ways and Means, or any member of that committee. I do not know that it does, but I know very well that it has been difficult to get this matter before the House. I believe the report has been made, and I hope that it will be acted on during this session, and that during the next Congress the business will be divided, as it should be.

It has not been through any unkind feeling toward any member of the Committee of Ways and Means that I have pursued this course; but when members consider the usual course pursued by the committee, I shall be fully justified by them in the efforts I have made to advance the public interests. The Committee of Ways and Means have been disposed to follow merely the estimates. And I say again that that is the result of the inability of any one committee to attend to all of the details of the great variety of subjects and measures which it is now the duty of that committee to examine.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means in one bill cut down the estimates $6,000,000, and the House restored them.

Mr. WILSON. I speak of appropriations made in accordance with the estimates and corresponding in sum, and to which the committee so often give the weight of their position without disposition or ability to give information in detail.

Mr. STEVENS. We cut them down more than six million dollars, and they were restored by the House.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman does not understand me.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I make the point that this debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WILSON. It is an unpleasant position for any member to occupy to run counter to the views and feelings of any committee of the House, and particularly is this so with respect to the Committee of Ways and Means. I must be permitted to repeat that, notwithstanding the crushing weight the chairman of that committee can bring to bear upon any member who may differ from him, I shall not withhold my efforts to discharge my duty as my judgment may dictate, regardless of his wishes, consulting only my desire to serve the country as best I can.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the House simply that the Committee on Rules placed in my hands a proposition to produce the reform referred to by the gentleman from Iowa—namely, to divide the Committee of Ways and Means into three committees, one on revenue, one on appropriations, and—

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a point of order. It is that the gentleman from Ohio is not speaking to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES.) The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. COX. I would like to know whether the Speaker knows how I am coming out on my argument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to say whether he does or not.

Mr. COX. I understood the Speaker to rule that the gentleman from Iowa was in order in his discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken. The point of order taken in the form in which it was was not a point of order, and the gentleman from Iowa was speaking to the question. It was simply an inquiry as to what the question was before the House.

Mr. COX. Then, as I understand, the Chair overruled a point of order when there was none made. [Laughter.] I am sorry to put the Speaker in that predicament, and I withdraw my remark. [Renewed laughter.]

I was about to say that proposed rules were placed in my hands in order to be reported to the House—

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Ohio is not speaking to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX. I respectfully decline to discuss this question any further. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "payable in gold." I move the amendment simply for the purpose of saying a word or two. Here are debts due from the United States to Indian tribes. We are paying interest in gold to the holders of our public debt, and I can see no reason why we should not pay this debt in gold. I propose this amendment at this time simply for the purpose of saying that I intend to move an additional section to this bill by which it shall be provided that all payments made to Indian tribes by virtue of treaty stipulations shall be payable in coin. I therefore withdraw my last amendment and renew my original amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill. Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to amend in line twelve hundred and forty-one, page 51, by striking out "$150,050" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000;" so that the clause will read: For subsistence, clothing, and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, at their new homes, $100,000.

On looking over the appropriations of last session of Congress I noticed that we appropriated only $100,000 for this purpose, and I believe the estimated amount of appropriation necessary was reduced upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman that I think the amount inserted in the bill is a mistake, and that the amount should have been $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph contained in lines twelve hundred and eighty-one and twelve hundred and eighty-three, inclusive, as follows: For salary of a special agent to take charge of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians now in the State of Wisconsin, $1,500.

I see that the last provision in the bill is an appropriation of $10,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of certain stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this agency is authorized by law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose it is not, but I really feel afraid to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] for fear he will consider it an indignity to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that a point of order can be well taken upon this proposition. There is no pretense that there is any law authorizing this agency.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not take a point of order, but I take a point of equity.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would take a point of order if I thought it would be sustained. Every appropriation is now construed as a contingency for carrying on the Government.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not consider this agency necessary, and if there is no law for it, I will go with the gentleman from Illinois in favor of striking it out.

Mr. COBB. I have not informed myself much upon this subject, and my colleague, [Mr. McINDOE,] a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House, having charge of this particular matter, is absent from the House on account of sickness. I will, however, say to the gentleman from Illinois that this agency was provided for by a law of the last session. There was a great delay in carrying out the act, and the agent for collecting these roving bands of Indians was not appointed until it was too late to do much.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state whether this was done in accordance with the provision of law of last session by which the salary of Dr. Davis was increased?

Mr. COBB. No, sir, it has nothing whatever to do with him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not recollect any other.

Mr. COBB. The act was passed last session, but the appointment for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the law was made too late, and those roving bands of Indians are there yet, very much to the annoyance of the people of that State. The Legislature and State officers have frequently asked the Department to take charge of them, and it was for the purpose of accomplishing that that the act was passed.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to state in a few words what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says upon this subject. The various wandering fragments of tribes which have hitherto given us so much trouble in the Northwest, and especially in Wisconsin, have been placed under the charge of a special agent, and any difficulty that might arise with them would be brought to the notice of the Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I stated, when I moved to strike out this provision, that the same thing was apparently provided for in a bill which is already before the House.

Mr. MORRILL. With the permission of my friend from Illinois, I will send to the Clerk's desk a communication in reference to this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

The communication was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, December 14, 1864.

SIR: In making up the general estimates for the requirements of the Indian service for the prospective official year, it was inadvertently omitted to estimate for an appropriation of $10,000, as a continuation of the provision in section one, act of June 25, 1864, "to enable the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of certain stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians now in the State of Wisconsin," &c.

I would respectfully ask that you call the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to this omission, and request him to present the matter to Congress, that the requisite appropriation of the above-named sum may be procured.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MORRILL. I will merely add that these Indians were removed from the State of Wisconsin; but after they were removed they found the country into which they had been sent incapable of supporting them. They were in danger of starvation and they returned to the State. The Government had taken charge of them, and a special agent had been appointed for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last half of that amendment. I did not expect that there would be any discussion upon this question when I joined with my Republican friend on the other side of the House in objecting to an unnecessary postponement of it. The gentleman who represents the Committee of Ways and Means now tells us that it is necessary to appropriate this $10,000. I do not think it is at all necessary to appropriate this money, and therefore I object to it. I would like to know wherein this agent, who has been appointed as a special agent, has rendered any services to the Government requiring the payment to him of this amount. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the amount to $1,000.

I make this motion for the purpose of saying that these agencies practically do not amount to much, at least in the protection of the Indians. I ask for the reading of an extract from a letter of Judge John W. Wright, of Indiana, a gentleman of truth and honor, with reference to the recent massacre of the Cheyenne Indians, in Colorado Territory. Here we see the value of these agencies.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"At the time of the attack of Chivington the village was under the protection of Major Colley, the Indian agent. In the village was John Smith, the interpreter, who came near losing his life. It was charged on by a regiment of troops at the dawn of day, without any notice and totally unexpected to the Indians, of whom about five hundred are killed, including all the women and children, as stated by Major Colley; six hundred horses, a large amount of Mexican dollars, of buffalo robes, and other plunder stolen, and their lodges burned. When Lawrence was sacked, part of the houses were burnt, some of the men killed; but there were no women and children murdered, and plenty of houses remained to shelter the inhabitants; but in the Cheyenne village all the women and children are killed, the lodges all burnt, after being robbed, and the naked inhabitants driven on the plains covered with two feet of snow."

Mr. HOLMAN. That shows how these Indians are protected. In order to show the further movement of this third Colorado regiment, which was guilty of this inhuman butchery, I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I send to the desk, from the Rocky Mountain News, published at Denver City.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The third regiment boys will probably not be here for a few weeks, as they say they are loaded down with buffalo robes, scalps, strings of silver dollars, &c., plunder taken from the Indians. Bully for them!"

Mr. HOLMAN. Plunder and scalps! Here we are appropriating every year vast sums of money, without any attempt to remedy the constantly recurring barbarities so dishonorable to our humanity. I had intended, if an opportunity had offered, to call attention to the remarkable fact that we made the usual appropriation last year for these Colorado Indians, as though they were the objects of our generous solicitude. I hold in my hand a message issued by the Governor of that Territory, on the 11th day of last August, in which occurs the following paragraph:

"And further, as the only reward I am authorized to offer for such services, I hereby empower such citizens or parties of citizens to take, capture, and hold to their own private use and benefit, all the property of such hostile Indians that they may capture, and to receive for all stolen property recovered from said Indians such rewards as may be deemed proper and just therefor."

And from this incentive, as I am assured, four hundred and eighty-one innocent women and children were deliberately slaughtered by the third Colorado regiment, one hundred and eighty-two of whom were little children.

These persons were not simply under the protection of the Government, but under the protection of our Indian agent, and but a short distance from Fort Lyon.

Of the amount that we annually appropriate for the protection of the Indians three fourths are for the benefit of that herd of men who hang about the Indian country and appropriate the money that we vote here in a spirit of humanity. Not one fourth of it reaches the unfortunate.

Mr. ASHLEY. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana if he pretends to charge gentlemen who favor this clause with being in complicity with men of that stamp.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make no such charge.

Mr. ASHLEY. Then I would like to know what the gentleman's argument amounts to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will tell the gentleman what my argument is. I am a little surprised that the gentleman should be wanting in sympathy for these unfortunate Indians. If it had been the case of an African, and he had been told that one hundred and eighty-two of the little children of Africans had been slaughtered in cold blood, we should have had this Hall resounding with his indignant eloquence. But they were Indians only.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McBRIDE. I wish to say a few words, and a few words only. The great difficulty we have had to encounter heretofore is that the Government has not kept its stipulations with the Indians. The gentleman now proposes to withhold the appropriation, so as not even to make a semblance of performing our treaty stipulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government owes it to itself and to civilization to see that the money which it appropriates shall be applied to the purposes for which it was designed, and not betaken up by plunderers and spoilers.

Mr. McBRIDE. I would support any plan that would enable the Indians to derive the benefit of the appropriations made here. The gentleman says that slaughters have taken place there. That is very true. Whether they were innocent women and children that were slaughtered I will not undertake to say; but I will state some few things which I have witnessed on the plains. I crossed them last fall, coming by Denver City, Colorado, and through the borders of Missouri. For one third of that distance every house and every improvement that was combustible had been destroyed by the Indians. Hundreds of persons traveling on the plains had been murdered during the fall and the early part of the winter by roving bands of Indians. It is not in human nature to witness the murder of men's friends and neighbors by savages without being moved to revenge. Does it startle gentlemen to know that these people felt sufficiently indignant to get together in parties and bands strong enough to take what they thought a just revenge? I think these facts should be known.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like the gentleman from Oregon to tell me whether they did kill women and children in the way reported.

Mr. McBRIDE. They murdered men, women, and children indiscriminately on the plains.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then they ought to be hanged, every one of them.

Mr. McBRIDE. Perhaps I did not understand the question of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I asked the gentleman from Oregon whether the men of this Colorado regiment killed children under nine years of age, and women.

Mr. McBRIDE. I know nothing of that, except what I have heard. I thought the gentleman had inquired of me whether the Indians had murdered white women and children.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to terminate the debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment,

Mr. HOLMAN withdrew the amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I move the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That all sums appropriated under this act, to be paid or expended in compliance with treaty stipulations, be so paid or expended in coin.

It will be perceived, Mr. Speaker, that my amendment refers only to such payments as are to be made under treaty stipulations. It does not apply to other sums appropriated in the bill. It is perfectly clear that if we had made treaties of this kind with a foreign Power we should be compelled to pay in coin. Should we do less for those in our power and under our control? Should we do less because the power is in our own hands? Can we afford to be unjust under such circumstances? I have been told that, to some extent at least—I do not know how far—some of these payments have been made in coin by the Secretary of the Treasury. But I doubt whether it has been so beyond those very few cases in which, for some special reasons, payment in coin has been expressly stipulated for. If we are bound to pay others in coin we certainly should pay these Indians in coin. At the time these treaties were made the value of a dollar was well understood. It was known just what it would purchase. If paid in our present currency it will procure only half of the commodities, half of the necessities for the Indians which it was agreed they should have. I trust that there is such a sense of justice in the House as will lead it to adopt this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments. I will not undertake, at this late hour of the night, to reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the call for the previous question so as to permit me to say a word.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly, sir. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.] I think there is great force in the proposition submitted as an additional section, and in the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He has well said that if it were with a powerful nation we were dealing we should never think of paying in paper money instead of in coin. I received, not long since, a very able letter from an Indian chief in my district, asking whether the Government proposed to pay the Indians in gold and silver, as it had agreed to do, or, if not, whether the Government proposed eventually to pay them in gold and silver or their equivalent. Now, I would like to see a proposition adopted by this House, if we cannot pay them in gold and silver, to pay them the equivalent of coin. It is but simple justice, and we should deal it out to these people. We should be just though the heavens fall, and not take advantage of these people because they are poor and weak and cannot defend themselves. I am in favor of this amendment.

In accordance with my promise to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] I renew the call for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. PRUYN.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Hall of the House of Representatives shall not be opened for public meetings, after the 4th day of March next, until the meeting of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

And then, (at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock p. m.) on motion of Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

RECESS.

Mr. FOOT. I will move now that the Senate take a recess to-day from half past four o'clock until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the credentials of Hon. RICHARD YATES, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Illinois a Senator from that State for the term of six years from March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating estimates of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the sums required to be appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty made with the Great and Little Osage Indians in Kansas, August 29, 1863, and the amendments thereto of July 2, 1864; which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating estimates of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the amount recommended to be appropriated for the balance due the confederated tribes of Kaskaskia, Peoria, Wea, and Piankeshaw Indians, arising from the sale of their trust lands by the late receiver general, William Brindle, and to be reimbursed on the final settlement of said Brindle's accounts; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending that special authority be given to the President of the United States to negotiate with the State of West Virginia for the assumption or payment by her of the bonds and obligations of the State of Virginia held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for various Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of importing merchants in the city of New York, praying for an extension of the time within which goods in public stores may be withdrawn or the duties paid thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial of Caleb Tompkins praying for compensation for property destroyed by the Army of the United States, at Cartersville, Georgia, on or about the 20th day of May, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NYE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Nevada in favor of the passage of a law fixing the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from the city of Washington as the eastern boundary of the State of Nevada; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a ship-canal from Lake Superior through the neck of land known as the Portage Isthmus to Portage Lake; which were read, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 474) to establish a commission of claims at Knoxville, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say, in introducing this bill, that I do not stand committed to favor all its provisions contain; but I introduce it for the purpose of having it considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which committee I move its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 124) authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to invest its funds in Government securities for certain purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 471) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 472) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof approved July 2, 1864, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Fosdick Fletcher, praying for the passage of an act authorizing a railroad to be built along the line of the thirty-second degree of latitude, following as near as practicable the surveyed route from New Orleans to St. Diego, with a branch to San Francisco, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 394) for the relief of the parties in a cause pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, wherein Emily F. Wiley is plaintiff, and Marshall Brown and others are defendants, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Todd, administrator of Joshua D. Todd, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying to be allowed the difference of pay between master and passed midshipman during the time he was acting master, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Joshua D. Todd, late of the United States Navy, deceased; which was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Edgar Conkling, agent for the Refugee Relief Commission of Ohio, praying for an appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in furnishing poor white refugees of the South with seed and farming implements, and such who are mechanics with tools, &c., asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Brandt, widow of Frederick Brandt, praying to be reimbursed for losses sustained by the sacking of Lawrence, Kansas, by Quantrell, on the 21st of August, 1863, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 377) granting lands to the State of Missouri to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) in relation to certain railroads, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

A motion by Mr. WADE to print the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th ultimo, information in relation to the present condition of Mexico and the case of the French war transport steamer Rhine, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

CHAPIN HALL.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall, have directed me to report it back without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage. It will take but a moment or two.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Chapin Hall the sum of $2,500 in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the taking and using of his lumber at Louisville, Kentucky, by General McCook's division of the United States Army, in the month of September, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANT TO MINNESOTA RAILROAD.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 295.

Mr. COLLAMER. What is the bill?

Mr. WILKINSON. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands for a certain road in Minnesota. There is no objection to it. The committee reported it unanimously.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 295) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State. The bill proposes to grant to the State of Minnesota, for the use and benefit of the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from La Crescent, and from Brownsville, on the Mississippi river, in Minnesota, to a convenient point of junction at or near Hokah; thence westwardly, between the south bend of the Minnesota river and the south line of the State of Minnesota, to the western boundary of the State, every alternate section of land, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of the road; but any lands which may have been granted to the State of Minnesota for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this railroad, or any portion thereof, by the act of Congress of March 3, 1857, are to be deducted from the full quantity of lands hereby granted, and any lands which may have been so granted are to be strictly applied in accordance with the terms and conditions contained in that act.

The sections and parts of sections of land which by this grant shall remain to the United States within ten miles on each side of the roads are not to be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor are any of them to become subject to sale at private entry until they shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line eleven, before the word "land" to insert the word "public," and after the same word to insert "not mineral."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-two, to insert the word "public" before the word "land," and after it to insert the words "not mineral."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line seven, after the word "railroad" to strike out the following words:

Then the Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the State patents for one hundred sections of land for the benefit of the road having completed the ten consecutive miles as aforesaid. When the Governor of said State shall certify that another section of ten consecutive miles shall have been completed as aforesaid, then the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents to said State in like manner, for a like number; and when certificates of the completion of additional sections of ten consecutive miles of said road are, from time to time, made as aforesaid, additional sections of land shall be patented as aforesaid, until said road is completed, when the whole of the lands hereby granted shall be patented to the State for the uses aforesaid, and none other.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And the said Secretary shall be satisfied that said State has complied in good faith with this requirement, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and selected as aforesaid, situated opposite to and within a limit of ten miles of the line of said section of road thus completed, extending along the whole length of said completed section of ten miles of road, and no further. And when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary shall be satisfied that another section of said road, ten consecutive miles in extent, connecting with the preceding section, is completed as aforesaid, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and situated opposite to and within the limit of ten miles of the line of said completed section of road, and extending the length of said section, and no further, and so, from time to time, until said road is completed. And when the Governor of said State shall so certify, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that the whole of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents to all the remaining lands granted and selected for the purposes indicated in this act, situated within the said limits of twenty miles from the line thereof, throughout the entire length of said road: Provided, That no land shall be granted and conveyed to said State under the provisions of this act on account of the construction of any railroad or part thereof that has been, or may hereafter be, constructed under the provisions of any other act, and adopted as a part of the line of railroad provided for in this act.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be disposed of by said State, for the purposes aforesaid only, and in manner following, namely: when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner as a first-class railroad, and the said Secretary shall be satisfied that said State has complied in good faith, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DOCUMENTS FOR THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 114) authorizing additional copies of public documents to be printed for the Department of State, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration. It will create no debate. It merely provides for the printing of a certain number of documents for the Department of State, to be given to our agents abroad.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which provides that of all public documents relating to foreign affairs, which are or may be ordered to be printed for the two Houses of Congress, there shall be printed and furnished to the Department of State two hundred additional copies, and that of all other public documents so ordered to be printed for Congress there shall be printed and furnished to the Department of State fifty additional copies.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 728) to pay to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension roll, $300 annually, as a gratuity in addition to the pension now paid to them, have directed me to report the same back without amendment, and recommend its passage. The bill is very short; I do not think any gentleman is opposed to it; and I will ask that it be read and put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that there shall be paid the sum of $300 annually to each of the persons hereinafter named, five in number, during their natural lives, as a gratuity on the part of the Government, they being the sole survivors of the Army of the Revolution whose names are enrolled on the books of the Pension Office, which gratuity is to be paid to them by the Commissioner of Pensions in addition to the pensions now paid them under former acts of Congress; the payment to each of the persons named to cease on the death of such person: to Lemuel Cook, enlisted at Hatfield, Massachusetts, is now about ninety-eight years of age, and resides in Clarendon, Orleans county, New York, $300; to Samuel Downing, enlisted in Carroll county, New Hampshire, is about ninety-eight years of age, and lives in Edmunds, Saratoga county, New York, $300; to William Hutchings, enlisted at Newcastle, Maine, (then Massachusetts,) is now one hundred years old, and resides in Penobscot, Hancock county, Maine, $300; to Alexander Maroney, enlisted at Lake George, New York, as a drummer boy, is now about ninety-four years old, his residence is Yates, Orleans county, New York, $300; to James Barmham, substitute for a drafted man in South Hampton county, Virginia, lives in the State of Missouri, and is in his one hundred and first year, $300. The second section makes it the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions, as soon as this act has been passed by both Houses of Congress, and approved of by the President, to have made out five copies of the same, each signed by the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the President of the United States, and to send a copy to each of the revolutionary soldiers above mentioned.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONDITION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interests, a statement showing what portions of the State of Louisiana were in the military occupancy of the United States on the first Monday of September, 1864, the date of the ratification of the alleged revised constitution of that State, and what portions of that State were then in the military occupancy of the rebels; and also in what parishes or election districts votes were given for or against the ratification of said instrument.

SOUTHERN REFUGEES.

Mr. SPRAGUE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to consider the expediency of so enlarging the powers of the Bureau of Emigration as to bring within its jurisdiction the relief and protection of the large number of loyal southern refugees who are fleeing from the tyranny of the rebel rulers to the loyal States, and may report by bill or otherwise.

MAIL POUCHES.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is a joint resolution on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads which I desire to call up. It is Senate joint resolution No. 121.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to purchase mail pouches or boxes of Marshall Smith's patent for the postal service, and for other purposes, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Postmaster General to purchase of Marshall Smith such number of mail pouches or boxes (constructed on the principle of letters patent issued April 28, 1863, and May 17, 1864, to him) as he may deem proper to fully test their utility and value in the postal service; and also to test a new mode of fastening mail bags, invented by Solomon Andrews, and to secure a patent for the same, the expense of which is to be paid out of any appropriations heretofore made or hereafter to be made to the Post Office Department.

Mr. HALE. That is a very singular proposition. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads would explain it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Postmaster General has been trying an invention made by Mr. Smith of boxes for the mails in lieu of pouches, especially for the railroad trains. Many improvements have been made in them, and the Department have found, so far as they have proceeded with the experiments, that the invention is a very valuable one. The Postmaster General now desires to have the privilege of buying a quantity of them in order to make a full experiment. There is no appropriation contained in the resolution. The proposition is merely to substitute them for the pouches now used.

Mr. HALE. Then there is a singular provision at the end of the resolution about some other invention.

Mr. COLLAMER. A Mr. Andrews has invented a new mode of fastening the pouches, and the Department want to buy some of them, and to pay for them out of the general appropriation for mail bags. The proposition is to allow them to use that general appropriation for this purpose if they wish.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 122. It will only take two minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 122) relating to international exhibitions at Bergen, in Norway, and Oporto, in Portugal, during the summer of 1865, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

As the Governments of the kingdom of Sweden and Norway, and of the kingdom of Portugal, have communicated to the Government of the United States the programmes of two international exhibitions to be held respectively at Bergen, in Norway, and at Oporto, in Portugal, during the summer of 1865, the resolution, therefore, proposes that the President of the United States be charged with the duty of making known to the people of the United States, by proclamation, or otherwise, as shall to him seem best, the facts in his possession relating to the international exhibitions proposed to be held at Bergen, Norway, and Oporto, Portugal, during the summer of 1865, and of inviting their participation therein.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That no expense shall be incurred for any agency with regard to such exhibition, nor shall any claim of any agent of our Government be hereafter recognized.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to that. That carries out the idea of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. FOOT. I move to take up House bill No. 710, to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin. I made an adverse report from the Committee on Public Lands on that bill yesterday morning. I desire now to have it taken up with a view to its recommitment to that committee for further consideration.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I now move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENT FEES.

Mr. COWAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 387. It is a bill which will not provoke any debate whatever.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 387) amendatory of "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the progress of the useful arts,' approved March 3, 1863." It provides that any person having an interest in an invention, whether as inventor or assignee, for which a patent was ordered to issue upon the payment of the final fee, as provided in section three of an act approved March 3, 1863, but who has failed to make payment of the final fee as provided in that act, shall have the right to make an application for a patent for his invention the same as in the case of an original application, provided such application be made within two years after the date of the allowance of the original application; but nothing in this act is to be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any persons who have manufactured or used any article or thing for which a patent was ordered to issue. This act is to apply to all cases now in the Patent Office, and also to such as shall hereafter be filed.

Mr. HALE. This bill seems to make an important alteration in the patent laws. I do not understand it. I wish the chairman of the committee would explain it.

Mr. COWAN. I think I can explain it in a very few minutes. Originally, under the patent laws, all the fees were required to be paid in advance, but some five or six years ago the laws were remodeled, and fifteen dollars was required to be paid in advance and twenty dollars to be paid after the patent was ordered to be issued. That twenty dollars is called a balance fee. The law required it to be paid within six months after the ordering of the issuance of the patent. Owing, however, to the difficulty of getting notice to patentees, scattered as they are over all the world, it very frequently happens that they neglect within the six months to pay this balance fee, and by that means lose their right to obtain a patent, and it gives to a person not really the inventor an opportunity to come in over their heads and ask for a patent for the same invention. We have two or three times passed acts extending the time within which the balance fee may be paid, so that the inventor may take out his patent; but still there remain a considerable number of them on hand, and the Commissioner is of opinion that this bill had better be passed now, by which the applicant will be allowed to begin de novo, the same as though he had made no former application, so as to get his patent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ARRESTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 317, providing for bail in certain cases of military arrests. It is a very short bill of one section.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary only be read, as it is a substitute for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee has been read and amended heretofore, and there is now a pending amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That any officer in the executive, military, or naval service of the United States, who shall arrest, or cause to be arrested, any person or persons not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and who is not engaged in the rebellion against the United States, shall immediately hand the person or persons so arrested over to the civil authorities to have the case investigated and the parties so arrested tried according to law. Any officer engaged in the executive, naval, or military service of the United States, who shall violate this section, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon indictment and conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to try and punish such cases, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $10,000, and confinement in the penitentiary of not less than one year nor more than five years, in the discretion of the court trying the same: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to prevent any officer who shall make an unlawful arrest from being prosecuted in a civil suit for damages for such unlawful arrest.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment did not come from the committee, and I was not aware that it was pending. I hope it will not be adopted. The object of the bill is a very simple one, and it contains but a single section. It was to provide that parties who, by the sixteenth section of the act of July 17, 1862, were placed in the military service, should be entitled to bail. That section has reference to contractors, and places them in the military service so far as to subject them to trial by military tribunals. It was thought by the Committee on the Judiciary that parties so arrested ought to be allowed bail, and that was the simple object of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky goes very much further, and opens this whole field of trial by military tribunals. I sympathize to some extent with the object which the Senator from Kentucky has in view. I do not believe in the absorption of all the judicial authority of the country in military tribunals; but I think he had better not press it upon this bill, as that amendment will doubtless lead to discussion. The bill we have prepared, I am quite sure, the Senator from Kentucky was in favor of in the committee. It is to allow bail to all those persons who are arrested under the sixteenth section of the act of July 17, 1862, instead of allowing them to be confined. I hope the Senator will not press his amendment on this bill.

I do not wish to discuss it now. I could not probably go for it in the shape in which it is presented, at any rate.

Mr. POWELL. I think the amendment is a very proper one, and I hope it will be adopted by the Senate. I know that the civil rights of citizens are being stricken down every hour by those persons engaged in making military arrests. I think the amendment will meet the approval of every Senator. It ought to do so, in my judgment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say just one word on this amendment. My own observation satisfies me that it is a very important one. The law which authorizes the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus directs that when arrests are made by the military authorities of persons not engaged in the military service of the country; in other words, when political arrests are made, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of State shall report to the proper court of the United States the persons under arrest at the next term of the court, and if no indictment be found against the parties so arrested at that term of the court, they shall be discharged upon such terms as the court may prescribe; and that if the Secretary of War or the Secretary of State did not so report to the court at the term of the court, then the party might apply to the court at the adjournment of the grand jury, and no bill being found, the court should thereupon discharge the party from such arrest. I understand that no attention whatever has been paid to this important provision of law. I think some effort ought to be made by Congress to secure some slight respect to this provision. It is an important provision.

On the contrary, sir, instead of obeying this law, men arrested under circumstances defined by the law of 1862 have been denied an opportunity to appear before the civil courts, as that law required they should be, and have been put upon trial before a military commission; and in some cases, as I understand, though the decisions have not yet been made public, have been sentenced to death. Whether these courts have jurisdiction to try such cases in some instances, is a question that is now before the President of the United States, or will be before him; but it is very clear that if the law of 1862, which authorizes the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, has any force or validity whatever, these military courts have no jurisdiction of the men they have assumed to try and condemn to death. I think after two years have elapsed, and these Departments have not respected this law, it is proper that Congress prescribe a penalty against any officer that disregards it in the future. It is a simple question whether the law of 1862 is to be respected by the Departments, or whether the Departments are to disregard the provisions of the law entirely. It was going a great way to suspend the writ of habeas corpus; but Congress was not willing to do it unless there should be this provision for the safety of the citizen. If this provision be disregarded, the citizen is without remedy. He is not allowed to ask the interposition of the writ of habeas corpus. He is denied that. His only remedy is that which the law gives to him, and that being denied him he is without remedy, and liable, in the case to which I have referred, to the terrible penalty of death.

I think, under such circumstances, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is a very important one, much more important than the proposition which comes from the committee. I care but little about that proposition which the Senator from Illinois says may be endangered by this amendment. The law provides that a contractor to supply the Army or the Navy shall, by his taking a contract, be regarded as a part of the Army or the Navy, according as he has agreed to furnish the one or the other. The Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, esteems it of very great importance that these persons being charged before a court-martial, as they may be charged under that law, shall have the right and opportunity to give bail. I am content that that should be; but it is not so very important as the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. The man who becomes a contractor under the law as it now stands voluntarily becomes a part of the Army if he agrees to supply the Army; if he agrees to supply the Navy he voluntarily becomes a part of the Navy, and liable to all the usages of the Army and the Navy in respect to military or naval trials. It is not so important that he shall have the right to give bail as that that other class of citizens who have never become a part of the Army and never become a part of the Navy, who are arrested without authority of law, who are denied the writ of habeas corpus, shall have the benefit of the provisions of the law which suspended the writ of habeas corpus.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, the fortification bill, and upon that question the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill and amendments read. I do not think it will take long.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a special order for this hour, on which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business has precedence, however, by the rule.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware of it, certainly, when this bill was left as the unfinished business; but I will move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution recognizing the State government of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I have the floor. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor on the bill before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He was not occupying the floor when I submitted my motion; but I will make the motion when he is through.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the amendments. I will say to the honorable Senator from Illinois that at this period of the session it is important that the appropriation bills be no longer delayed. The fortification bill has been lying on our tables for some days past. I called it up last night before the adjournment so that it might be the unfinished business for to-day. I do not think it will take long. I do not think the honorable Senator ought to interpose legislative business, especially of a character which might have been acted upon long ago, at this period of the session, in the way of an appropriation bill. This is the only appropriation bill now pending in the Senate, but all of them are now pending in the House of Representatives, and we must therefore give them the preference or precedence in business in order to get them through during the next week. I will ask for the reading of the bill now before the Senate and the amendments of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely wish to say that the Senator from Illinois has utterly repudiated all special orders, and I am very glad that he has an opportunity to take a dose of his own medicine. I trust the Senate will repudiate all special orders, especially those of the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. My motion to postpone this measure and all others and proceed to the consideration of the special order assigned for this hour, I suppose is now in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor, and he calls for the reading of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can I not stop the reading of the bill by making a motion at any time when a bill is being read? Is it not my privilege to stop the reading of a bill and make any motion I think proper?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not while another Senator is entitled to the floor. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio has sat down.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply called for the reading of the amendments, so that I may then make my remarks upon them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator claims the floor, of course I am not entitled to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to enable the Senator to test the sense of the Senate, (I hope without debate,) I have no objection to allow the Senator to submit his motion. As a matter of course, I hope the Senator will not debate the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will yield, the motion will be in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not ask him to yield. I claim the right to make this motion, and if I am not entitled to make it now, I will wait until I have the right to make it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will ask for the reading of the amendments of the Committee on Finance to the fortification bill, and I will say what I have to say upon that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside informally to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 682) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1866; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit courts in the district of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 693) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States yesterday approved and signed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 240) for the relief of George A. Schreiner;

A bill (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864;

A bill (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857; and

A bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 682) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1866, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the committee, which was in section one, line three, to strike out the words "the following sums be and they are" and to insert the words "there is;" so that it will read:

That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Am I entitled now to the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks, if these questions are put separately, the Senator would be entitled to the floor; but if the bill is simply to be read through for the information of the Senate before the Senator from Ohio proceeds in his explanation of it, the Senator would not be entitled to the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Chair will either recognize me or not, as it so pleases the Chair; it is indifferent to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If a debatable question arises in the reading of the bill, and the Senator from Ohio yields the floor, then the Senator from Illinois would be clearly entitled to it; not otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first amendment of the committee has been read, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly do not want to interpose in the way of the Senator from Illinois submitting his motion; but as he would not accept as a courtesy what he had not a right to do, I will not yield, but will say what I desire to say in favor of this amendment.

The amendment of the committee proposes to strike out all the specific appropriations for fortifications, amounting to something like four or five million dollars, and to substitute in lieu thereof the following:

For the completion, preservation, and repair of such existing fortifications and other works of defense as, in the opinion of the President, are needed for the present war, and to preserve in repair existing fortifications and works of defense, $1,500,000.

The basis of this amendment is this, that during the present war it is not wise for the Government to expend large sums of money in anticipation of a future war. All the fortifications that are stricken from this bill are fortifications built for a war against France and England, or other foreign Powers. They are of no consequence whatever in the present war. It is not expected that the rebels will take New York, or put in danger any of our fortifications.

This was the leading idea of the amendment. It was adopted after full consideration, after an examination of General Delafield, and after full conversation with the officers of the Department having charge of these works, and I hope it will be adopted by the Senate.

The fortifications that are stricken out are on the Pacific coast, on the lake coast, and on the Atlantic coast. The appropriations that are retained will enable the President to complete and preserve all fortifications needed for present defense, including, I hope, the repair of Fort Sumter, Fort Pulaski, and all the forts that are now needed for the defense of the southern coast. The appropriation proposed is ample for all the purposes of the present war. We do not strike out any appropriation for the present war. The money, however, cannot be expended in completing or carrying on the work on fortifications on our northern boundaries.

I do not think it is necessary for me now to make any further explanation. Although upon this subject there was some difference of opinion in the committee, yet I believe it was almost the unanimous sentiment of the committee that at this time we ought not to make further appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I take it I am clearly entitled to the floor now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate postpone the present and all other orders, and proceed with the special order assigned for one o'clock to-day; and on that subject I desire to say a word or two in reference to what was said by the Senator from Ohio as to this fortification bill. The very statement made by the Senator from Ohio shows that there is no necessity for proceeding with it now. He informs us that it is the only appropriation bill left.

Mr. SHERMAN. One has come in since.

Mr. TRUMBULL. One of them has come in since; and the others are all in the House of Representatives. It is a short bill, which he thinks he can pass in a very few minutes; and being so, certainly there is no great urgency to press out of the way a matter of very considerable importance to this country, I think of vital importance to it; and it is not a measure that might have been acted upon months ago. It has not been before us months. It is true, it is some weeks since the credentials in the Louisiana case were submitted; but it has taken time to take testimony and ascertain facts, and the joint resolution reported by the committee, and which was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, was reported back last week. I think the members of the committee at least will bear witness to what I say when I state that that subject has given us a great deal of thought. We have spent a great deal of time upon it, and brought it before the Senate at as early a moment as we could. It is not a matter of that general legislation which ought to be permitted to have the go by.

I was present in the Senate last evening, but it seems it escaped my notice, or I should have objected at the time to the fortification bill being taken up. I was not aware that the Senator had called up this bill with the view of superseding the special order for to-day. I certainly should have objected to it. It must have been done at some moment when my attention was not called to it. Under the circumstances I should have objected to it at the time. I was very much surprised, when the order of the day was called for, that an appropriation bill, the only one left, that is to occupy our attention but half an hour, was to crowd this Louisiana matter aside, and on the assurance of the Senator from Ohio that it is vastly important, that we have got but half an hour to devote to this measure, and it must be considered now, and crowd out the special order of the day. But, sir, as this matter is up, I will not occupy the time of the Senate, but will withdraw my motion, and let us devote the half hour to the Senator's bill and see if we can finish it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the motion is withdrawn I will state to the Senator that it is true this bill might be postponed, probably without great disadvantage, but let me remind him that the Committee on Finance have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. I have not been able to take a part in the deliberations of the Senate during this week, and the very moment this bill is passed I have to go back to the committee to complete the examination of the tax bill; and although we are not to-day pressed with appropriation bills, to-morrow and the next day and the next day we will be. I hope this afternoon to be able to report the tax bill if I can get a little leisure. That will come up on Monday, and must be disposed of. In the mean time, the appropriation bills, not one of which has been passed, will come to us. One has come within a few minutes, and two others must come to us from the House of Representatives, and all the rest must yet be acted upon on reports of committees of conference. It is therefore indispensable, in order to prevent the accumulation of business at the close of the session, that these appropriation bills be taken up and acted upon the very moment we can reach them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is the motion withdrawn?
The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I simply desire to make an inquiry. The resolution to which the Senator from Illinois alludes having been fixed for one o'clock to-day and having been displaced by this bill as the unfinished business, I suppose it will come up immediately after this bill is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill and amendments.

The next amendment was in section one, line five, after the word "appropriated" to strike out the words "for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is in section one, line nine, to strike out the following item:

For Fort Wayne near Detroit, Michigan, $125,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole of these items are in fact but one amendment, and I hope the question will be taken on the whole of them together.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member whether this amendment, if adopted, will not strike out all the other appropriations except such as are included in the amendment of the committee? I think the bill as it came from the House of Representatives provides for the completion of Fort Patuxco, upon which the defenses of Baltimore rest. I will ask if there is any appropriation in the bill as it came from the House for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that they will all be read, and he will then see.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, after line eight, to strike out the following items:

For Fort Wayne, near Detroit, Michigan, $125,000.
For repairs of Fort Niagara, near Youngstown, New York, $50,000.

For Fort Ontario, Oswego, New York, $100,000.

For Fort Montgomery, at outlet of Lake Champlain, New York, $100,000.

For Fort Knox, at narrows of Penobscot river, Maine, $150,000.

For Fort Popham, Kennebec river, Maine, $150,000.

For Fort Preble, Portland, Maine, $150,000.

For Fort Scammel, Portland, Maine, $100,000.

For Fort Georges, on Hog Island Ledge, Portland, Maine, $150,000.

For Fort Constitution, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000.

For Fort McClary, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $100,000.

For Fort Winthrop, Boston, Massachusetts, $20,000.

For Fort Independence, Boston, Massachusetts, $10,000.

For Fort Warren, Boston, Massachusetts, $20,000.

For sea-wall of Great Brewster's island, Boston harbor, Massachusetts, $40,000.

For repair of sea-walls on Deer and on Lovell's islands, Boston harbor, Massachusetts, $5,000.

For permanent forts at New Bedford harbor, Massachusetts, $100,000.

For Fort Adams, Newport, Rhode Island, $100,000.

For Fort Hale, New Haven, Connecticut, $55,000.

For Fort Schuyler, East river, New York, $50,000.

For fort at Willet's point, opposite Fort Schuyler, New York, $100,000.

For repairs of Fort Hamilton, New York, $50,000.

For fort on site of Fort Tompkins, Staten island, New York, $100,000.

For fort at Sandy Hook, New Jersey, $100,000.

For repairs of Fort Mifflin, near Philadelphia, $35,000.

For repairs of Fort Washington, on the Potomac river, $50,000.

For Fort Monroe, Hampton Roads, Virginia, $50,000.

For Fort Clinch, Florida, $100,000.

For Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, $400,000.

For Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Florida, $200,000.

For fort on Ship island, coast of Mississippi, $100,000.

For fort at Fort Point, San Francisco bay, California, $400,000.

For fort at Alcatraz island, San Francisco bay, California, $330,000.

For additional defenses at San Francisco, $100,000.

For defenses of Washington, $500,000.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For the completion, preservation, and repair of such existing fortifications and other works of defense as, in the opinion of the President, are needed for the present war, and to preserve in repair existing fortifications and works of defense, $1,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighty-three, to strike out the words "contingencies of fortifications, including," so that the clause will read: "For field-works and field operations, $1,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line ninety-six, to strike out the following clause:

For repairing, equipping, and enlarging Fort Porter, at Buffalo, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot concur in the general policy of the amendment proposed by the committee, which contemplates the absolute suspension of all expenditures upon the forts of the country. If these works have at any period during this war been deemed necessary it seems to me the argument holds good at the present moment.

The appropriations for the completion of these works are as necessary this year as they were last.

Last year it was the policy of the Government, and the opinion of the War Department, that these works should be prosecuted to completion.

I am not aware of any particular change in the sentiment of the country, or of the Administration, or of the Departments, or in the general condition of the country, which authorizes this radical change, this absolute and entire suspension of these Government works.

None has been stated, I believe, by the honorable chairman of the committee, and surely none can be conceived, I think, from the general attitude of public affairs.

It may be said, I know, that these works must be prosecuted at the present time at great expense.

It should be remembered also that they must be suspended at great loss.

These works cannot be suspended at the present moment without very great loss; and it seems to me that a policy which has been recommended by every Department of this Government since this war began, and urged as necessary for the defense of the country, should not be brought to a stand-still without some evidence, some exhibit, some recommendations from the proper Departments of the Government that the thing was desirable. I do not know what reason the committee have. I have heard none in particular stated, and therefore I protest against this general change.

I rose more particularly to call the attention of the Senate to the obvious distinction which is made in this amendment. I think if the amendment is to prevail the same principle should be applied to other portions of the bill. The general feature of the amendment of the committee is that these appropriations shall be limited to such works as are deemed absolutely necessary, in the judgment of the President, for the present war; and so all the appropriations for works upon the coast, which it seems to be assumed by the Committee are not necessary during the prosecution of this war, are stricken out. But, on the 5th page of the bill, $300,000 are appropriated "for surveys for military defenses, and for purchase of campaign maps." What defenses? What part of the country, and for what purpose? I submit that, if that appropriation is to be allowed at all, it should be amended so as to read in conformity with the general feature of the amendment of the committee, by adding the words "and needed for the present war." Then again I find:

For survey of northern and northwestern lakes, including Lake Superior, $125,000.

Now I do not rise to make a general opposition to that appropriation, but I ask the honorable chairman of the committee on what ground is it that $125,000 are to be appropriated for the survey of the western lakes, without any statement or any specification of any necessity or urgency for that survey as applicable to the present state of the country, while, at the same time, you are to have these expenditures upon the coast stricken out?

Mr. GRIMES. Move to strike that out.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall only move that in case the general appropriations deemed necessary heretofore to prosecute these works on the coast should be stricken out. The same is true also, I think I may say, in regard to the next item:

For engraving and printing charts of lake surveys, $15,000.

The other items on this page seem to have some relation, I suppose, to the present prosecution of the war. If it be the sense of the Senate to adopt the amendment of the committee, striking out these general appropriations for the prosecution of the works of defense, which have been recommended by the Government since the war began, and which I conceive to be as essential for the successful prosecution of this war against all interference or pretense of interference abroad as any of the fortifications which you can construct, I shall then move that this part of the bill to which I have alluded be made in conformity to the general objects of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can satisfy the honorable Senator that we have not retained the items to which he objects from any sectional view, or from any desire to discriminate in favor of one class of improvement over another; and our attention was called to the very items to which he refers.

For surveys for military defenses, for purchase of campaign maps, $300,000.

The amount seemed to be very large, but it was said that in the country in which they will be used the expense of making these campaign maps was very great indeed, as in the recent campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and from Atlanta to Savannah. We have each of us been served with campaign maps, the very appearance of which indicates that a great deal of expense and care has been taken in making those maps, and their value is of infinite importance. The amount of $300,000 seemed to be very large, but we had not the materials to make the reduction. The "surveys for military defenses" would be entirely in the South, and for the purposes of the present war. There is no occasion for surveys for military defenses in the northern States.

In regard to the second item, "for survey of northern and northwestern lakes, including Lake Superior," I can inform the Senator that a system has been adopted by which these surveys are placed under the engineer department, while the surveys on the coast are placed under the Coast Survey. We did not wish to interfere with the appropriations either for the coast survey or for the lakes. If, however, the Senator thinks we ought to suspend these surveys during the war, as a matter of course this item ought to be stricken out, and with it the items for the coast survey in another bill. The committee were not disposed to interfere with either of these surveys for this reason: we are informed by the proper officers that if we should suspend the operations of the coast survey or the surveys of the northwestern lakes, we should probably lose a great deal more than we would gain by temporary economy. That did not apply, however, to the fortifications, which were permanent in their character, upon which the loss could not be much. The present system of surveys of the northern and northwestern lakes has been going on with the coast survey, but they are carried on by different Departments of the Government. The provision for the one is made in this bill, and the other appropriation is made in what is called the civil appropriation bill. It is a matter upon which I have not the slightest feeling.

The appropriation "for engraving and printing charts of lake surveys" is the ordinary appropriation for that purpose, and, as a matter of course, should fall in case we either diminish or stop the surveys on the northwestern lakes.

Now, in regard to building fortifications at present, I can say that the estimate submitted to us was nearly twice what was granted by Congress at the last session. What was done at the last session was done under entirely different circumstances from the circumstances that exist now. No one anticipates an immediate European war. No one anticipates that if we were to be involved in war for the next five years that these fortifications would be completed for the purpose; and indeed they are only a part of a system of improvement which cannot be completed for four or five years. If we appropriate $4,000,000 this year we will be called upon to appropriate the same sum next year and the year after. It is probable that five years must pass by before these fortifications would be of any great value; and if my friend from Iowa [Mr. Grimes] is right in his theory these fortifications are of no account when completed. The old fortifications are admitted to be of little value. The earthworks thrown up on the southern coast of Fort Fisher and Fort McAllister, new works composed entirely of earth and wood, have resisted a much greater amount of force than the best fortifications built under the old system. The present fortifications built by the United States have been of but very little service to the southern States. With the exception of Fort Sumter, they have been scarcely any; and that was built on an island, you may say; a peculiar fortification, where earth could not be used. General Delafield himself said that wherever earth could be obtained an earth fortification was superior to a rock fortification. That is a demonstration of the present war. More than that, the improvements made recently in gunnery have made unavailable the old method of fortifications, so that they are of no account. An iron-clad will run by a fort even of the best character; and our iron-clad boats could demolish any one of the old fortifications.

Now if you prepare a new system of fortifications to meet the present guns, the probability is that by the time the fortifications are built new guns will be invented, new projectiles will be devised. The wit of the whole world is now employed in improving gunnery, and machinery, and works of defense. The probability is that after we should have expended twenty or thirty million dollars to make a new system of fortifications some ingenious person would devise new projectiles, new guns, new improvements of aggressive attack which would render nugatory and valueless all this large expenditure.

On the whole, the Committee on Finance were satisfied that we ought not now, in the midst of war, to go on expending large sums of money in building fortifications when we were in no immediate danger. It was also shown that $2 50 of appropriations now will not build any more work than one dollar would six years ago; and the probability is that if we postpone our system of fortifications until a time when our paper dollar is equivalent to a gold dollar, we can do then for $1,000,000 what it will now cost $3,000,000 to do. Under these circumstances, it seemed to us to be unwise to continue this system of fortifications.

We applied this rule to all sections of the country, to the Pacific coast, to the lake coast, (and there are several appropriations in this bill intended for the protection of the lake coast,) and also to the Atlantic coast, and only appropriated money enough to enable the President to repair such fortifications in the southern States as it may be necessary to repair. I trust that Fort Sumter will be rebuilt, merely for the honor of the thing, and perhaps Fort Pulaski should be rebuilt also; but with the exception of the fortifications in the southern States, necessary for the present war and the present exigencies, we deemed it unwise now to appropriate money.

Mr. MORGAN. The specific appropriations that are proposed to be stricken out, I suppose, were made upon the estimates or recommendation of the engineer department. I should like to know whether that department has changed its mind in reference to these appropriations. The amount appropriated by the bill is upward of four million dollars, and the appropriation proposed by the amendment of the committee is but $1,500,000. I will inquire of the chairman whether that amendment is in accordance with the views of the War Department or the engineer department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have had no official communication with the War Department on the subject. General Delafield, who submitted these estimates, as a matter of course desires these appropriations. I have had no official communication from the head of the War Department, and do not desire to quote his opinion or any conversations that I have had with him on the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. These specific appropriations, I suppose, were made in accordance with the views of the engineer department.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; in accordance with the annual estimates; and I can state to the honorable Senator from New York that General Delafield was examined by the Committee on Finance, and his views were very maturely considered.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is true, as stated by the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, that General Delafield, the chief of the Engineer Bureau, was before the committee when the bill now before the Senate was being considered. It is also true that General Delafield adhered with great pertinacity to the recommendations specifically made and contained in the bill, a substitute for which has been reported by the honorable chairman; and upon the closest examination he adhered to his opinion in every case. I wish now to state to the Senate that while I regret being compelled to oppose the recommendation of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, I feel that it is due to the country and due to the State that I represent here to take that course.

The proposition is to abandon the ordinary appropriations made for the fortifications on our seaboard, both east and west. It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that these appropriations are about double what they have been heretofore. That point was explained very clearly by General Delafield when before the committee. He said the need for these increased appropriations arose, first, from the necessity of a new armament upon all or nearly all our fortifications; that if those fortifications were to be preserved as means of national defense, to be effective now for that purpose against the new system of building ships, they must necessarily be furnished with new artillery, otherwise they would be ineffective and subject to be successfully attacked by any enemy that might approach our coast. To meet that, the majority of the committee thought that we did not stand at this time in danger of a foreign war; that the iron-clads of France and England and the rams of the rebels, if they could get upon our sea-board, would not approach our forts; that we stood in no danger of attack. Upon that proposition the judgment of the Senate is to be pronounced.

Mr. President, in my own humble judgment there never has been a time in our history, nor since this war began, when it was better economy to secure the United States from attack from abroad than at this time. It is true that we are not directly threatened with a foreign war; but it is true and patent to every American that the reason why we are not threatened with a foreign war is because the nations who are able to threaten, and whose interest, perhaps, it would be to threaten, do not desire to do it now. We are passing through a period when it is no longer, perhaps, a matter of doubt as to our success against our domestic enemies; but is that a reason why we should leave our coast defenseless, with thirty-pounder guns, with a few columbiads here and there; which are no longer relied upon as means of defense? I think not, sir. I think it would be very bad economy indeed to refuse this appropriation of $4,000,000 simply that it might be saved, while by so doing we should be exposed to the direct necessity in case of a foreign war.

Mr. SHERMAN. As my friend is going off on an error, perhaps I ought to inform him that the appropriation for guns and ordnance is not in this bill at all. We have appropriated in the Army bill all that was asked for guns and ordnance. The only trouble is that we do not put them on works which are not built.

Mr. CONNESS. I take issue there with the honorable chairman. I know that was stated in reply to me in the committee. I know that the chairman can show appropriations for guns in the Army bill; but, sir, it was stated specifically by General Delafield in the committee that these appropriations did not contemplate new works, but the increased effectiveness of old works, by placing guns of a superior quality and caliber upon them. To the objection made and now stated by the honorable chairman of the committee, or to a question put to General Delafield, "Are not earthworks more approved now, and have they not been proven to be of greater utility than fortifications built of granite?" this was his reply: "Earthworks alone without bomb-proofs, requiring a very heavy expenditure, are worth nothing. The enemy can throw up earthworks as well as you, and he can shell you out of your earthworks unless you have expensive bomb-proofs built. You cannot preserve your ammunition from the weather and the shells of the enemy, nor your men from his iron hail, unless you have those bomb-proofs built, which are very expensive."

Again, the general explained the necessity of adhering to fortifications built of stone. At many of our ports, where science and engineering demonstrated their necessity, there was no possibility of building earthworks, and therefore they had to build them into the sea, and build them of stone, and build them by providing for one tier of guns above another. He said that earthworks were not new; that every demonstration that had been made in favor of earthworks of late had been long known to the engineers, not only of this country, but of other Governments. I think the statement made by General Delafield before the committee was as convincing proof as anything could possibly be that we should adhere to the appropriations recommended by that department.

Why, sir, if we refuse the appropriations asked for for the Pacific coast at present, to what does it expose us? I appeal to honorable Senators who have been in that country, and whose minds furnish them at once with its topography. The engineer department have answered the question, Is the great port and city of San Francisco sufficiently protected from a foreign enemy? The answer at once is, no. It was stated by General Delafield, to a question I put to him on that point, that there was nothing to hinder an enemy from taking many of those fortifications in reverse, that the appropriations asked for did not even contemplate the construction of a fortress at what is known as Lime Point, on the northern side of the passage known as the Golden Gate, but for the placing of more effective artillery and carrying on and finishing the works that were being built upon the island known as Alcatraz island, in the harbor opposite the entrance, and for the erection of such other works as should protect Fort Point on the rear.

But honorable Senators and the committee say, "There is no danger of your coast, there is no foreign enemy." Sir, we think there is a foreign enemy getting pretty near our doors. We think that that foreign enemy is a jealous and powerful enemy. We think that that foreign enemy has recently, during our great national needs, been guilty of a policy that deserves the severest watchfulness, the highest degree of preparation and the most intense determination on the part of Americans to defend ourselves against its encroachments. Why, sir, the emperor of France did not conceal his purpose in his letter to General Forey, but declared that the purpose of his policy in Mexico was to check the advance of the United States. That declaration is on record. It has not been withdrawn by him. We have no reason to assume that he has taken it back. We have no reason to suppose that he is prepared to modify it. In my opinion, he never will modify it, but in view of the attitude that we shall take, and the ability we shall show to preserve ourselves against his encroachments. His encroachments thus far, it is true, have consisted in attacking and nearly destroying a feeble next-door republican neighbor. But, sir, when he shall have successfully accomplished that, if he shall unfortunately, what will be his next step? Are we to be left alone after he has secured a base from which he can operate? If we are, it is to be only because we shall be prepared for that time and hour. I do not mean here to threaten war against any Power with which we are at peace; but I do mean that all shall understand we mean to be prepared and to confront whatever Power, or all foreign Powers together, whenever they shall encroach upon or assail us.

I warn Senators not to lose sight of the importance of that preparation because of the desire to economize. It is true that there is a necessity for economy; but, sir, we are often wasteful of the public moneys, either by ill-projected operations or by wasteful expenditures of a varied character. Shall we in regard to this arm of the public service, in regard to this great fountain of our national security, undertake to make up these wasteful losses and economize? I hope not.

It was explained by General Delafield that there was the greatest possible national necessity for retaining in the highest state of defense the fortifications known as Key West and the Tortugas. Why, said he, let those be taken by a foreign Power, and they have at once a base from which they can invade us. Is it policy to neglect the warning voice of the able and gifted man who stands at the head of the engineer department of the United States? I think it is highly creditable in the Committee of Finance to endeavor by every means to lessen the public expenditure; but I think that disposition to lessen the public expenditure, and to guard it, should not be set up against the opinion of General Delafield. I think his opinion should be regarded; and I trust the Senate will not accept the substitute offered by the committee. In my opinion it would be an unwise economy and an inferior statesmanship.

One word more, sir, and I shall conclude. Explanation was further made by General Delafield in regard to the protection necessary to the city of Detroit. I will not dwell at length on his statements; but suffice it to say that he gave it as his opinion that there was a necessity for the improvement of Fort Wayne. He explained that the use of steam furnished great advantages to an enemy in passing fortifications; but that at that point a complete barrier might be erected or lodged in the passage, by which the ships of the enemy would be compelled to stand until they would be destroyed by our guns. Shall we leave that important point, with others, exposed? I hope not.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I rejoice that the Committee on Finance have come to the conclusion which I reached four years ago, and have recommended, that the Senate shall not proceed with the costly business of continuing to make large forts. I am willing to admit with the Senator from California, and with other friends of the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of the engineer corps, that he is a very scientific, practical, and able man. I am willing to admit also that that corps is the élite of the Army; but it should be remembered that it is their profession to make forts, and that whenever you take away from them the appropriations and the power to continue the exercise of that profession, their vocation is gone. I trust that the engineer corps are not like the Bourbons, who "never forget and never learn anything."

Sir, has not this war taught us something? Has not our experience at New Orleans taught us something? When the expedition against New Orleans was gotten up there was but one man in the entire engineer corps who did not say that it was utterly impracticable for New Orleans to be taken.

There was one single exception, and I will name that man. It was General Barnard. He said that it was possible to be taken. Did not your wooden ships pass right by those fortifications, fortifications that were deemed by everybody almost, and especially by your engineer corps, as being incapable of being passed by any kind of vessels, much less by wooden vessels? Were we not told that Fort Morgan was the strongest fort on this continent? And what was the result when Farragut attacked it? How long was it able to resist wooden ships? What has been our experience with Fort Pulaski, also one of the strongest forts, it was said at the beginning of the war, that we had on this continent? How long was it able to resist the attack of the members of this same engineer corps? Why, sir, I apprehend there is not a single fort now in the possession of the United States that is not capable of being reduced in forty-eight hours by our own vessels, should they see fit to attack it, or should it become necessary for us to attack it; partly growing out of the nature of the constructions, and partly growing out of the incapacity thus far to make projectiles and guns which are capable of attacking and destroying iron vessels.

Mr. President, it is not inappropriate for me to read in this connection a letter which I have before me, published in the London Post, and which reached this country, I believe, only the day before yesterday. The letter is written by the celebrated Mr. Blakeley, the inventor and maker of guns in England, and one of the most distinguished artisans of that country. It will be remembered that after the taking of Fort Fisher, Admiral Porter made some remarks in his report in regard to the value of the iron-clad monitors, which he said had been under the guns of Fort Fisher for five days at a distance of eight hundred yards, and had come out entirely, or almost entirely, uninjured; and he also said that with the Monadnock and vessels of her class he would be willing to undertake to cross the ocean, or something tantamount to that, and reduce the towns on the coast of Great Britain. Captain Blakeley says:

To the Editor of the London Post:

Now that Fort Fisher has fallen, in spite of the heroic defense of General Whiting, Colonel Lamb, and the rest of its garrison, there can be no indiscretion in my giving you some information about its armament.

The fact most instructive to us is that the fort contained not one gun powerful enough to sink an iron-clad ship. A very late letter mentions as the most effective gun in the place an eight-inch five-ton cannon, rifled on the plan of Commander Scott, of the English navy, and firing one hundred and thirty pound shells. Of the rest, about half were seven-inch built-up rifles; half were ten-inch, smooth-bored, cast-iron guns.

Now mark what he says:

Most of these guns were more powerful than any gun mounted on any fort in England or on any English ship, (except one, which has a few of the valuable 100-pounders ordered by the Duke of Somerset,) yet they failed to injure the Federal fleet. It follows that that fleet could attack Portsmouth or Plymouth with more impunity than Fort Fisher so far as artillery fire is concerned.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. A. BLAKELEY.

We have the highest British authority for saying that those iron-clad vessels, if they crossed the Atlantic, were capable of attacking the fortifications of Portsmouth and Plymouth—fortifications that were designed to protect the largest navy-yards on the globe, navy-yards that contain more supplies by double than any navy-yards on the globe. Now, what is the necessity for our going on and proceeding to build more of these forts, when—

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will rest the opposition I make to the adoption of the substitute now before the Senate upon an application to General Delafield as to whether these appropriations are recommended for the purpose of building forts or not. I am entirely satisfied that that is not the purpose of the recommendations and appropriations; but on the contrary, his statement is clear and unequivocal that the appropriations are chiefly needed. I know that the honorable chairman believes himself right; I know that he gesticulates with great earnestness, and says I am wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply shook my head, for I do not wish the Senator to fall into that error. I hold in my hand the Army bill, which appropriates $3,000,000 for guns for fortifications, and those guns are made in the ordnance department. My friend certainly should know the organization of the War Department sufficiently to know that the Engineer Bureau and the Ordnance Bureau are separate and distinct things. The Engineer Bureau, which General Delafield has charge of, has nothing to do with making guns; he builds fortifications. General Dyer is the man who can talk to you about guns.

Mr. CONNESS. I am quite aware of that. Will the Senator from Iowa excuse me if I trench a moment more upon his time?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I presume we are all aiming to get at a correct conclusion. I am just as well aware as the honorable Senator from Ohio that General Dyer or the ordnance department takes charge of the preparation of guns; but General Delafield did say that the guns now necessary to beat off iron-clads could not be placed upon the platforms which hold the guns of the old style, and that large appropriations were necessary to make the necessary changes. Now, I repeat again that I will withdraw all opposition to the amendment of the chairman, if General Delafield will not, in a communication, reaffirm what I say.

Mr. GRIMES. That this is to make guns?

Mr. CONNESS. That that is not to make guns, but to prepare the forts to receive the guns that have been demonstrated to be necessary for coast defense.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can satisfy the Senator from California. I will ask him whether there is any fort now at Fort Point.

Mr. CONNESS. There is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any fort at Alcatraz island?

Mr. CONNESS. There is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will ask the Senator if it requires $730,000 to put guns upon those forts?

Mr. CONNESS. I will answer the Senator—

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let me say further, that in the Army bill which has already passed both Houses, and which is a distinct and separate appropriation, there is an appropriation for these guns of $3,500,000.

Mr. CONNESS. I am glad the honorable Senator has made this specific statement; we shall now understand each other, and the Senate may understand the matter. The Senator, in the first place, asks me if there is a fort at Fort Point. I say yes. He asks me, is there one at Alcatraz island? I say yes. Now, the next question is, is $730,000 necessary to put guns on those two forts? I say to the Senator in answer to that question, that in the first place, General Delafield did not say so; that in the next place, I do not say so; but that General Delafield did say that some part of this $730,000 was necessary to erect such defenses in the rear of Fort Point as should prevent it from falling into the hands of an enemy who might approach it in the rear; that not one of these guns is worth a straw—the Senator smiles; I suppose he has a right to smile—that not one of those guns at Fort Point is worth anything except in the direction of the sea and the harbor, and that therefore a portion of the appropriation is necessary to erect fortifications to protect the fort known as Fort Point from being taken in reverse.

Now, let me make an additional statement to the honorable Senator from Ohio, and the honorable Senator from Iowa, both of whom I conceive to be aiming to secure the highest degree of the public interest. I asked General Delafield what was the armament at Fort Point now. I stated to him that when I was there, (which was not very long since,) there were only two or three columbiads in the entire fort; that its defenses consisted of 30-pound guns. He said it was in that condition still, but the ordnance department had recently sent some large guns to that coast. I knew they had. But you cannot work one of those guns without making some changes in Fort Point. You cannot prepare it for them without heavy expenditure. The guns required and demonstrated to be required by the very letter read by the honorable Senator from Iowa, written by Mr. Blakeley, shows that necessary appropriations must be made before they can be availed of. What does Mr. Blakeley write? He says there was not an iron-clad sunk by the guns of Fort Fisher. Why? Because he says the guns were not of sufficient caliber and force. All our forts on the eastern sea-board are in just that condition; and you cannot place those large guns in position without large appropriations of money. I repeat again, before I close, that I know I am right; that this appropriation is not for the manufacture of guns, but that it is for the proper replacement of the old and inefficient artillery with guns that shall be necessary and effectual in sinking iron-clads that dare approach them.

If the argument of the Senator from Iowa is worth anything, it goes against all fortifications on our sea-coast. I will not say to the honorable Senator that he represents Iowa, which needs no fortifications of this kind; because he is too high-spirited, and this Senate have shown a sufficient evidence of his knowledge of that branch of the public service by placing him in the high position of chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body. I appreciate his opinions; but I ask him in candor to examine and weigh the effect and force of that letter of Mr. Blakeley, which shows clearly that we have not a fort in the United States that is capable of sinking an iron-clad at the distance which her great artillery enables her to lie off from us, while she assails us, unless we replace the guns that are now upon our Atlantic and Pacific sea-board fortifications by more effective artillery.

Mr. GRIMES. The letter of Mr. Blakeley proves a great deal more than the Senator from California says. It says that Fort Fisher was more heavily and more ably armed than any of the vessels in the British navy or any of the forts along the British sea-coast. His expression is:

"Most of these guns were more powerful than any gun mounted on any fort in England or any English ship, except one, which has a few of the valuable nine-inch 100-pounders ordered by the Duke of Somerset."

Mr. Blakeley might further have said that two of the Armstrong guns that bore the mark of the English arsenal upon them, the best pattern of Armstrong guns, were also included in the armament of Fort Fisher. The inference, therefore, not only would be that the 30-pounders and the 24-pounders, or the 68-pounders that are now mounted in our forts, to which the Senator from California has alluded, would be of no possible use against an attack by sea by a naval force, but even if you were to increase your armament, and strengthen it up to the same degree of excellence that the English Government have strengthened their armaments, they would be of no value. Many of the English ships-of-war have mounted upon them Armstrong guns, which that Government have hitherto considered as the best armament that could possibly be devised; and yet, in the estimation of Mr. Blakeley, none of those guns are able to meet an iron-clad at a distance of eight hundred yards, and do it any material injury.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it not now palpable to the Senator from Iowa that the confession that is contained in that letter of Mr. Blakeley, that there is not an English ship that can at the same distance withstand the fire of the guns we now use, or the guns with which we captured Fort Fisher, furnishes the strongest reason why we should place that class of ordnance that our iron-clads used in the capture of Fort Fisher upon our forts? If, as he says, there is not a British ship that can withstand the power of those guns, I should think it would follow that there is no British ship that can withstand our forts, having like guns placed upon them.

What Mr. Blakeley tells the British people is, that the American fleet which captured Fort Fisher could successfully attack the fortified ports of the British empire, and therefore they should at once put their forts in a proper condition of defense against our iron-clads by placing upon them heavier armaments than they now have. Can anything be more conclusive in favor of the proposition the Senator now opposes?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; it does not follow at all. What we want to successfully resist an iron-clad when it attempts to enter our harbor is a gun mounted on a vessel that can come nearly in contact with the iron vessel that is attempting to make an encroachment upon us, and not locate it on a fort a mile or a mile and a half away from the channel, as many of these forts are located.

Now, Mr. President, if this appropriation were wholly and exclusively for what the Senator from California thinks it is, that is, to change the embrasures of the fort so as to admit a different species of cannon to be used from those for which the forts were originally constructed, I would be in favor of it.

Mr. CONNESS. That is it.

Mr. GRIMES. But here is a diversity of opinion between the two Senators. The chairman of the committee says that it is to build new forts and to prosecute the construction of old forts that were undertaken before the developments and the instruction that have been furnished to the nation by the prosecution of the present war.

Mr. CONNESS. We can easily get the opinion of General Delafield for the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from California says the purpose of the amendment is to change the construction of these embrasures so as to admit the use of a different species of artillery. I am willing to go with the Senator from California to accomplish that purpose, because the forts may then be of some service. I do not think the old forts that have been built will ever be of any material service; but I think they would be of some service; I think it would be a wise expenditure for us to change them, so that we can use the proper kind of artillery in them; but I am unwilling to vote for an appropriation that shall provide for prosecuting the construction of forts that were undertaken before the commencement of this war, and before the lessons that have been taught us by Fort Hindman and Fort Morgan, and St. Philip and Jackson, and Macon and Sumter, had been learned by the nation. I thought there was one thing that was learned from the Crimean war by all the nations of the earth; I thought Todleben had been a great instructor of people; and that was, that the old necessity of fortifications was an exploded idea; and that where ever earth could be obtained, earth was the proper material with which to make fortifications.

The Senator from California says that it is necessary to have bomb-proofs. That is true. There should be bomb-proofs, and magazines; but those will not constitute the stone fortifications. It would be necessary to make walls around those bomb-proofs, perhaps, and then cover them with earth. I would be willing to provide for the construction of such fortifications as those; and stone walls should be built around the magazines; but the idea of building a magazine in a fort entirely of stone, as some of them are being built now, I think would be absurd in the highest degree, with the teachings we have had on this subject.

Mr. President, I do not know what the vote may be on this subject. I do not know whether we are prepared to abandon this old and effete system that has been fastened on us for the last fifty years; but the time is not far distant when the Senator from California and I will occupy precisely the same position on this subject. The first foreign war that this nation has will demonstrate that the old fortifications are utterly valueless, just as this war has demonstrated that our artillery was of no value; just as the Mexican war demonstrated that the artillery with which our ships were mounted in 1812, by the side of the artillery we had in 1846, was of no comparative value.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Iowa, I think, has made a captive of himself. He has promised or said he would be in favor of an appropriation for the building of forts for the purpose stated by the Senator from California; that if the object of the appropriation was to enlarge the forts or to reconstruct the forts—

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say that. I stated expressly that if the purpose was to prosecute to completion old forts that had been undertaken before the lessons we have learned during this war were taught us, I was opposed to it; but that if we were merely to change the embrasures so that artillery of a different description could be used, then I was in favor of it.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator had allowed me to get through with my statement, perhaps he would not have been so ready to correct me. I understood him to say, and I submit to the Senate that was the spirit of what he did say, that if the appropriation was intended for the alteration of forts or the enlargement of the embrasures of forts so as to use artillery or guns of a different caliber, such as had been demonstrated to be useful in a war like this, then he was for it. Now, if General Delafield said anything—and I think he did say something, because I put the question to him myself in regard to it—but if he did say anything in regard to these forts, he did say what the Senator from California says he did say: that he desired to reconstruct or so repair these forts that they should take this very artillery which had been demonstrated to be so useful in this war.

I did not understand from what General Delafield said that he was a man who never learned anything, as the Senator from Iowa would seem to intimate the engineer corps never did. He did not say, in so many words, they never learned anything; but he said he hoped they were not like the Bourbons, who never forgot and never learned. General Delafield confessed that the war had demonstrated that you must have better guns, and he wanted to prepare these forts under his charge to receive those better guns, and hence he asked the appropriation. He asserted, what everybody will assert, probably, who has looked on this war, that earthworks were better to a certain degree where they could be used, than stone; but, said he, what are you going to do on a rocky point, where you cannot build an earthwork; where the sea would wash it away the moment you did build it? You are driven—it is your last resort—to use stone. When the Senator from Iowa, with all his astuteness, undertakes to say that Fort Fisher was armed with these heavy guns, heavier than any English fort was ever armed with, and yet they were powerless under the Navy, let me tell the Senator from Iowa that Fort Fisher held the Navy at bay entirely until a land force was landed and took it by assault. What we want is to arm these forts all along the coast with the guns that are made necessary by the progress of war, the progress of engineering, and the ordnance department; to arm them with that sort of guns that shall be efficient, and to alter the forts for the reception of those guns.

Mr. CONNESS. And the progress in ship-building.

Mr. CLARK. And the progress of the Navy. I admit, and I feel a pride in it, that the great Navy has made wonderful progress; that the victories of the Navy have been full of glory, and have won for it renown. I rejoice that we have made this improvement in guns and missiles. I hope we shall be able to make the improvement in fortifications made necessary by these improved guns, and thus protect our harbors.

Now, Mr. President, it will be understood, I think, from what I say that I did not agree to this amendment of the Finance Committee. There is another reason why I did not agree to it beyond what I have stated. The bill appropriates specific sums for different fortifications, as, for instance, Fort Wayne a given sum, Fort Niagara another given sum, and so on through the list of fortifications which it is desired to improve or rebuild. The proposition of the Finance Committee is to strike out all these different appropriations and to put into the hands of the President of the United States a given sum of money to expend where he shall deem best. I do not doubt the honesty, I do not doubt the discretion of the President of the United States; but here it is understood that he has a million and a half of money to be expended at Portland, or Portsmouth, or Boston, or New York, or Philadelphia, or some location on the Pacific coast, and the men who are the smartest and who can make him understand that there is the most necessity in this or that harbor, will get the money. I do not propose, and do not wish to leave it in the hands of the President in that way. I say that Congress should judge of the necessity of the appropriation at a given place, and make the appropriation or refuse it, as the necessity may be. If it is not necessary that any of these forts should be improved or rebuilt, or the work be carried on upon them, let us strike out the appropriation entirely and take it away, and not put money into the hands of the President to use it as he may deem wise, (and perhaps it will be wise,) or as certain people may persuade him is wise.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to another thing that General Delafield said bearing on these earthworks. The question arose on an appropriation made in this bill; in lines seventy-six and seventy-seven, the Senate will see an appropriation for the defenses of Washington of $500,000. I said to the general, "How can it be necessary that you shall expend $500,000 for the fortifications around Washington, when the war is coming to an end apparently, and when there will be no further necessity to maintain those forts for a great while?" and his answer was that the earthworks around Washington have got to be rebuilt to a very great extent. We had wooden breastworks in them, and magazines made of timber and earth thrown over it, and the timber is all rotting and falling down, and we have got to rebuild the magazines of all those forts. It is not wise, I submit to the Senate, to construct forts so that we shall have to rebuild them every four or five years in that way. We must have a more durable material than that. It may be well, as the Senator from Iowa says, to construct them of stone and then throw earth over them, where you can get the earth and the earth will stay, because earth is a thing that resists shot better than anything else that can be used.

I agree with all that has been said by Senators on the one side in regard to the economy that should be practiced at this time. I know that it is more expensive to build works now than it was three years ago, and perhaps more expensive than it will be two or three years hence; but if we are to do any work now, if we are to make an appropriation to be used the coming season, I submit that it will be better to strike out a part of the appropriations in the bill for specific places and to appropriate the balance, than to cut it all out at one swoop and then give a gross sum to the President to expend as he chooses. Let us use the discretion that legislators ordinarily use, and if Fort Wayne needs a less sum than the bill appropriates, make it less; if Fort Wayne does not need anything, cut it out; and then of the next item, if that work needs less, cut it down, and so on; but not, against the opinion of the engineer who has the works in charge, sweep the whole away and appropriate a gross sum to be put into the hands of the Chief Executive to do as he may see fit in regard to it.

Let me instance the harbor of Portsmouth in my own State. There are two forts there, Fort McClary and Fort Constitution, those forts lying perhaps in a direct line a mile and a half below your navy-yard, and you leave them unfurnished with arms in the state they are now in, or nearly so, and you leave all the property of your navy-yard and your yard itself entirely unprotected. It has been found necessary by the engineer and the ordnance departments during this war to mount two heavy Parrott guns in Fort Constitution for the protection of the harbor for the time being. At Fort Constitution you no more could make an earthwork than you could make one in this Senate Chamber. It is on an extreme rocky point projecting into the harbor where the tide runs around it with a velocity that would take away any earth you might put there. It is founded on solid rock.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will permit me to say that I thought I understood General Delafield to state specifically in answer to a question of the Senator in regard to Fort Constitution, that the object of the large appropriation for that very work was to put heavy guns in it.

Mr. CLARK. He did so state, and anybody who has known that fort for any length of time would know the necessity of putting heavy guns there. Fort McClary, on the other side of the harbor, is a water battery down close to the edge of the water, with a hill behind it, for the defense of the harbor.

Now, Mr. President, I submit to Senators whether it is wise in this state of the military art to leave all these fortifications entirely useless, if I may so speak, or nearly so, for the want of preparation and heavy guns to put upon them. Take Portland harbor in the State of my friend before me, [Mr. MORRILL.] I submit to him and I submit to the Senate that on the rocky islands at the mouth of that harbor you cannot build an earthwork; it is an impossibility to do it. I submit to him and the Senate, and to anybody who knows the locality, the necessity of building up fortifications in the harbor of Portland, which is the very point that the enemy would seek in a foreign war, if we should ever be engaged in one with England, in order to reach the Canadas by the Grand Trunk railroad. It may be wise to forsake what has been the policy of the Government for years and years, but I do not believe it is. I hold that the way to prevent a foreign war is to make yourselves strong against it. Your enemy will not attack you when he sees that he will be beaten if he does.

Mr. GRIMES. I simply desire to say that the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to any claim that I preferred for the Navy in connection with Fort Fisher are wholly gratuitous and uncalled for. I claimed nothing for the Navy in that connection. I simply read a letter from the highest authority in the empire of Great Britain to show that the fact that our iron-clad vessels remained uninjured under the fire of the rebels at Fort Fisher indicated that Portsmouth and Falmouth in England lay at the mercy of our iron-clads, should they go there and attack them. That is all I said; and as to the remark that the Navy did not accomplish anything and were incapable of accomplishing anything until a land party from the Army went ashore, it was wholly gratuitous.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator does not claim anything for the Navy, I will be a little gratuitous and I will grant him something for the Navy. I think they behaved with great gallantry on that occasion. I do not desire and I will not take from them one particle of the meed of glory which they earned. I simply meant to say that that fort was so armed with heavy guns that the Navy could not take it—not to detract anything from the Navy. My object was to show that forts could be armed so as to resist the iron-clads of a foreign Power as that resisted our iron-clads.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is always an invidious task to endeavor to reduce appropriations. One would suppose here, from listening to this argument, that the Committee on Finance were in some way proposing a very radical reduction of expenditure. Now, sir, I declare that the amount appropriated by this bill for fortifications is more than has ever been appropriated by this Government in any bill, with the single exception of the bill of last year. The amount proposed by the Committee on Finance is within $300,000 of the amount appropriated last year, and never was so much appropriated before; and yet from the clamor raised here in regard to this bill one would suppose we were striking at all the fortifications.

Mr. President, I am tired of this. We are now involved in a war in which everything is at stake. All the money is needed just as the life-blood of the system is needed, and he who would abstract money from the Treasury of the United States now for any purpose that can be postponed is not doing the country a public service; yet there is scarcely a measure that has been proposed in the last twenty years demanding public money but is now pending before us. We must stand up and resist these things. I know that honorable Senators desire to advance the interests of their constituents. They naturally see in the works to be constructed in their own neighborhood reasons that others cannot see; but the question is presented to us, shall we now in the midst of this war, when we have all we can do to raise the money necessary to carry on the war, pile up granite in New Hampshire or in Maine, shall we build fortifications at San Francisco? I say to the honorable Senator from California that if California be attacked, all the power of this Government will be at her back to defend her against France or any other country, and I ask him whether the expenditure of $1,000,000 now on Fort Point will tend to protect us from the French? Not at all. The history that is now being made by our gallant soldiers and brave officers in the South will protect us and protect California more than all the granite that may be piled up on Fort Point. Let us postpone these works until we can build them with care and fidelity; let us postpone all these improvements until we have money without borrowing it from the people; let us not divert loans which are given to us for our national defense in this struggle to piling up granite anywhere for a doubtful service.

But the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, who desires a part of the appropriations in this bill for his State, says that the President ought not to be trusted to distribute this money as the committee propose. Let us see whether we have not guarded the discretion of the President. We provide here that $1,500,000 shall be expended "for the completion, preservation, and repair of such existing fortifications and other works of defense as in the opinion of the President are needed for the present war, and to preserve in repair existing fortifications and works of defense." He has no power under this appropriation to take money and expend it on works which are not now needed in this war. We give him no discretion to do that. He will have no power under this appropriation as reported by the Committee on Finance to take money and expend it at Detroit or on the forts in Portland harbor; he can only keep those forts in a state of preservation and repair; but he has power, and we place at his discretion $1,500,000 to be expended on the forts needed in the present war, as for the repair of Fort Sumter and Fort Pulaski, and the forts at Key West. There it may be necessary to continue the works during the present war to preserve our armament in that region, to maintain our hold along the Atlantic coast. It is necessary for us also to rebuild and repair the forts at New Orleans and at Mobile, which are in our possession. We make an appropriation and do not cripple or limit the power of the President in expending this money on the line of forts along the southern coast. We have every one of them now, and we intend to hold them; and until the flag of our country floats in every portion of the South we will hold these fortifications as the line of coast defense, and we place in the power of the President an ample sum—more than was demanded—to hold these forts and put them in a state of perfect repair. But when we are called upon to expend so much money, to take three or four millions more and plant it in the form of granite along our Pacific coast and Atlantic coast, it seems to me the idlest thing in the world. We place no unreasonable discretion in the President, we do not give him power to spend money and subject him to being harassed and bothered by those who demand money for their particular localities. All the power we place in his hands is to hold on to the forts we have in the southern States and not to expend the money of the people in forts along the northern coast.

Some honorable Senators seem to anticipate a war with the French. Sir, such remarks and discussions invite controversy with the French. I tell you that our guarantee against a French war is in the power evinced by the American people. I do not fear a French war; let it come when it will, we are prepared for our defense. I do not fear any of the Powers of Europe. I would not excite a controversy with them. We have no occasion for a European quarrel. There is no point now upon which we can have a European quarrel. We propose no interference with them, and when they undertake to interfere with us our history within the last five years shows that we are able to defend ourselves.

Mr. President, this has been an earnest effort at least to check expenditure in this direction. At the last session we appropriated for all the fortifications $1,800,000. Now the committee propose to appropriate $1,500,000. I ask if that is not enough. Last year we appropriated for the defense of San Francisco $140,000. They have two forts there. Now it is proposed to appropriate for those works over eight hundred thousand dollars. I ask Senators if that be wise.

But the honorable Senator from California says the forts ought to be armed with the new guns. I say to him again that the guns are made in the Ordnance Bureau, and we have appropriated all that was asked for guns. If any money is desired to place guns in position in the forts there are appropriations which can be used for that purpose; or if it is necessary for that identical purpose, there is no objection to giving the engineer department enough money to man or reman our fortifications. But the great body of the money appropriated in this bill would not be used for any such purpose. I doubt whether $50,000 of it would be used for the purpose of transporting ordnance and placing it in the forts. All that is the business of the ordnance department; and what the engineer department does is to adapt the forts to the new armament. Whatever is necessary to adapt the forts to the new armament, I have no objection to appropriate here; but I know from General Delafield, and I know also from the whole history of this matter, that the great body of this money if appropriated will not be spent in adapting the forts to new gunnery, but in carrying on new works of defense and completing those which have been already commenced. That is the intention, and General Delafield, who has been quoted so often, said the object was to place these forts in a condition of permanent defense against foreign Powers; and when the question was put to him whether the money was needed to enable us to protect ourselves against our present enemy, he promptly answered, "Certainly not."

Now, sir, we must defend ourselves on the plains of Virginia and North Carolina and Tennessee. We need not prepare ourselves for future defense against foreign Powers. Let the future take care of itself. Let us do our duty now, put down our present enemy, and I tell you we shall have peace in this country for a generation to come. I do not fear future war. Let us only get out of our present trouble, husband our resources for that purpose, and we need not fear foreign Powers. But for us now to borrow money which must eventually be repaid in gold and plant it on the shores of the Atlantic, or the lakes, or the Pacific, to be repaid hereafter threefold is an act certainly not of wisdom or economy. We cannot do it; we must put down the brakes somewhere; and I do not know where it can be done better than in this fortification bill. For one, I do not apply to this bill or to any measure affecting the Atlantic or the Pacific coast a rule that I would not apply to myself and my own constituents. Some of the people in my State along the northern border fear that the British may come over and attack us as they did in the war of 1812. I represent a section of the country which was occupied at one time during that war by the British and Indians. I do not fear that now. We feel able to defend ourselves, and with the good aid of the people of New Hampshire and California and other sections of the country, if we shall ever again be involved in war with Great Britain, we will make Canada the battle-ground, and not the plains of Ohio. I do not utter this as a threat. I only say what every man of sense knows, that the contest will not be at Fort Wayne or at the forts along the lake shore, which it is now proposed to rebuild and improve; but it will be in Canada where the battles will be fought for the defense of our own territory. Why then seek difficulty? Why provoke difficulty by building forts and fortifications for which there is now no use? If, as I said, it is necessary to appropriate a small sum of money to adapt our existing fortifications to the new armament, that is provided for; we have appropriated in the Army appropriation bill, which has now received the sanction of both Houses, $3,500,000 for ordnance for fortifications.

There was one remark made by the Senator from New Hampshire which struck me with surprise. He said that $500,000 was needed for the defense of Washington. We have provided for that. It is here in the first item not stricken out, "for field-works and field operations." The Senator says the reason why the appropriation is necessary is to rebuild works. Undoubtedly General Delafield said he desired to rebuild some of these magazines; but his principal purpose is to make another line of defense about Washington, a new line; and the Senator, I suppose, in order to prevent them from rotting down in three or four years, would build them of granite, and in that way would save the loss and damage of their rotting down. Does the Senator know how much it would cost to transport enough granite or stone from New England here to rebuild these fortifications and make them water-proof and fire-proof?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will pardon me; I said no such thing; and I think I said nothing from which it could be inferred that I meant to build them of granite. In that connection I was not speaking about these temporary fortifications around Washington. I hope they are but temporary. I instanced them merely to show that earthworks in that way would decay very quickly.

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt of it; but what has that to do with the question? We have provided here $1,000,000 for field-works and field operations, and the very fact that during this war these improvised earthworks made entirely of earth, with wooden magazines, which are drier and better for many purposes, according to the books, have resisted us more than any other form of fortification, ought to prevent us from continuing the old system of fortifications. Wherever earth can be found, wherever it can be hauled, wherever it can be reached, it is admitted now to be the best basis of fortification, and granite works and stone-works are to be only used where earth cannot be found. That is shown by the case of Fort Fisher and by the case of Fort McAllister. Not a single one of the old fortifications which cost this country $150,000,000 has ever been of any material service to us or, I believe, to the rebels. The $150,000,000 which have been expended in fortifications, if put out at interest at the time the money was expended, and accumulated to this hour, would carry on this war for one year. There never has been money worse wasted than that we have spent in building a system of fortifications which must be changed every ten or twelve years to adapt them to modern improvements.

I have been perfectly willing to vote any amount of money for building iron-clads and iron boats wherever they have been demanded. I believe the only way to defend our sea-coast is by building a certain class of monitors and boats to float in our harbors. It appears to me sensible and reasonable that a single battery floating upon a monitor in the port of New York, for instance, in such a position that it can be moved from place to place, can follow a public enemy, itself impervious against attack, so strongly armed that the most powerful projectile now known to modern warfare cannot penetrate it, is the proper kind of harbor defense upon which we must rely. Earthworks, and stoneworks, and guns planted on the shores will not answer the purpose. Hereafter naval contests and all contests along the shore will be such contests as that between the Monitor and Merrimack, where they were eye to eye, face to face; and the cannon exploded within eight feet of where the shot struck. If ever hereafter two maritime nations are engaged in war, the great battles on the sea will not be at the distance of a mile, like the battles of the Nile and Trafalgar, but they will be wrapped together face to face, more like the battle of Lake Erie, under the gallant Perry. Sir, we shall hereafter rely for the defense of our ports upon the iron-clads. Iron supersedes stone. This is the age of iron; no longer the age of stone. Earthworks which may be improvised in a month will disappear, and iron-clad turrets and monitors, and all the numerous progeny that will spring from the inventive race of which we are a part, will supply us with ample coast defense in case we have a foreign war. These can be made within a year. These can be made within one tenth of the time that a single field-work or fortification can be built. We must rely upon them, and therefore I am opposed to this constant expenditure upon an old system of fortifications.

Mr. MORRILL obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator now allow me to offer an amendment? I propose to amend the bill by reducing the amount appropriated in the original bill for each of the fortifications.

Mr. JOHNSON. That does not affect this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such an amendment is not now in order, but it will be in order when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sure the Senate will agree with me that this debate has assumed an importance which it had not on the bare statement of the proposition at first. It is not a question now of the appropriation of two or three millions, or of the difference between $1,500,000 and $3,000,000, but it is a question of the abandonment or the prosecution of the defenses of the country. That is the proposition. It is avowed in the speech of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that the whole system of defenses planned for the defense of this country is to be abandoned. I submit to that honorable Senator that when that proposition is to be presented to the Senate and considered it is not fit, with all due respect to that committee, it is not becoming that it should be proposed to the Senate of the United States by the Committee on Finance. It is not a subject-matter which has been committed to their care or over which they have any special control. Has it come to this, that the defenses of the country are to be suspended in this hour of public peril both from within and from without? Who has advised it? Who tells the Senate of the United States that these defenses are no longer necessary? The War Department of the Government? What Department of War has told the American people that the prosecution and completion of the public defenses of this country are useless and that they are no longer to be relied upon? Nobody. No Department of the Government. It is an unauthorized suggestion of the Committee on Finance, on a mere question of finance submitted to them; that is all. I say "unauthorized" in no offensive sense, of course, but I say "unauthorized" because it is not a subject over which the Finance Committee have any control, or which in the ordinary course of legislation, is at all submitted to them.

We have it from the honorable Senator from Iowa that you are to rely for your coast defense upon the Navy. I can understand why a remark of that sort should be expected from the honorable Senator from Iowa, whose great preference for the Navy has led him to believe that all can be accomplished by the Navy; but has it entered into the heart of any sensible man to suppose that three thousand miles of coast can be defended by the Navy without a fortification at any point? The proposition is absurd; in the nature of the case it is absurd. All the fleets of the globe on this coast cannot defend it against a foreign enemy, at all points I mean, of course; and I dismiss that assumption.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance falls into the same error, and he tells us in the close of his argument that we are to rely for the defense of the coast, this wide, extended coast on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, upon the Navy; that the hundred and fifty millions of money which have been expended for the defenses of your coast has been a useless expenditure of money; those works have profited us nothing, and since they have been in the possession of the rebels they have profited them nothing. Is that the history of the war? Mr. President, what do you say of Fortress Monroe? Has that been of no advantage to the Government of this country? How were we able to hold that portion of Virginia but for that? What do you say of Fort Sumter? The whole power of your Navy was brought to bear on Fort Sumter, and for twelve months it stood out in bold defiance against all of your assaults. No benefit to anybody? It has been of infinite mischief to us. With the whole power of your Navy concentrated upon Charleston, the fortifications constructed by the rebels principally have been able to hold you in check and hold you at bay. And with these facts staring us in the face, patent to everybody, we are to be told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that hereafter for the defense of the coast we are to rely upon the Navy, and that the works for which one hundred and fifty millions of money have been appropriated for the defense of the country are to be abandoned as useless, and that further appropriations are not to be made to complete these forts. I understand that a bill has already been passed here and has become a law, having passed both branches, appropriating (I do not know how much) perhaps three millions of money to make guns to put upon these forts, and now the forts are to be abandoned!

If I understand the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts for the reduction of the amounts specifically appropriated, that is a proposition which can reasonably be entertained, because that does not propose the abandonment of the fortifications. I can understand that. But I submit to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that these appropriations have all been recommended by that Department which has these forts particularly under its care. These estimates have been made with reference to the demands of that Department, and it is to be presumed with a better knowledge of what is required than the honorable Senator who makes this proposition; and unless some gentleman has information which can furnish the Senate with the reasonable supposition that these sums are too large I should hope the amendments of the committee would be rejected, and also that which is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I will wait for that and see what it is.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I propose now to amend the part of the bill proposed to be stricken out by reducing the appropriation for Fort Wayne, near Detroit, from $125,000 to $75,000; that for Fort Niagara, near Youngstown, New York, from $50,000 to $25,000; that for Fort Ontario, Oswego, New York, from $100,000 to $50,000; that for Fort Montgomery, at the outlet of Lake Champlain, New York, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Knox, at the narrows of Penobscot river, Maine, from $150,000 to $75,000; for Fort Popham, Kennebec river, Maine, from $150,000 to $75,000; for Fort Preble, Portland, Maine, from $150,000 to $75,000; for Fort Scammel, Portland, Maine, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Georges, on Hog Island Ledge, Portland, from $150,000 to $75,000; for Fort Constitution, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from $50,000 to $25,000; for Fort McClary, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Winthrop, Boston harbor, from $20,000 to $10,000; for Fort Independence, Boston harbor, from $10,000 to $5,000; for Fort Warren, Boston harbor, from $20,000 to $10,000; for the sea-wall of Great Brewster's Island, Boston harbor, from $30,000 to $20,000; for the repair of the sea-walls on Deer and on Lovell's Islands, Boston harbor, from $5,000 to $3,000; for permanent forts at New Bedford harbor, Massachusetts, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Adams, Newport, Rhode Island, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Hale, New Haven, Connecticut, from $95,000 to $50,000; for Fort Schuyler, East river, New York, from $50,000 to $25,000; for the fort at Willett's Point, opposite Fort Schuyler, from $100,000 to $50,000; for repairs of Fort Hamilton, New York, from $50,000 to $25,000; for the fort on the site of Fort Tompkins, Staten Island, New York, from $100,000 to $50,000; for the fort at Sandy Hook, New Jersey, from $100,000 to $50,000; for the repairs of Fort Mifflin, near Philadelphia, from $35,000 to $20,000; for the repairs of Fort Washington, on the Potomac river, from $50,000 to $25,000; for Fort Monroe, Hampton Roads, Virginia, from $50,000 to $25,000; for Fort Clinch, Florida, from $100,000 to $50,000; for Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, from $400,000 to $200,000; for Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Florida, from $200,000 to $100,000; for the fort on Ship Island, coast of Mississippi, from $100,000 to $50,000; for the fort at Fort Point, San Francisco bay, California, from $400,000 to $150,000; for the fort at Alcatraz Island, San Francisco bay, California, from $330,000 to $150,000; for additional defenses at San Francisco, from $100,000 to $50,000; for the defenses of Washington city, from $500,000 to $300,000.

I do not, Mr. President, feel like abandoning the fortifications along our coasts either on the Atlantic or Pacific, but I feel the force of the argument of the Senator from Ohio in regard to the condition of the Treasury. I have therefore moved this amendment, which appropriates just about one half of what is appropriated in the original bill, and I think if it be adopted it will answer substantially the purposes of the Government during the coming year.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in his amendment, but I suggest to him that in regard to the items for Fort Winthrop, Fort Independence, Fort Warren, the sea-wall at Great Brewster's Island, and the repair of the sea-walls on Deer and Lovell's Islands in Boston harbor, he should make an appropriation of a sum in gross for those works. The sum that he proposes to appropriate for them is small, about forty-eight thousand dollars, and I suggest to him that he put that portion of his amendment in this shape:

For Fort Winthrop, Fort Independence, Fort Warren, for the sea-wall on Great Brewster's Island, and for repair of sea-walls on Deer and Lovell's Islands in Boston harbor, $43,000.

So that the engineer department can have the money and use it as they may find occasion in that harbor, as these sums are so small. I have no choice about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that his plan of reducing the appropriation, as seems to have been his purpose, one half perhaps, would be wrong in relation to some of these appropriations. For example, the item of $5,000 for sea-walls on Deer and Lovell's Islands, Boston, he proposes to make $3,000. That much might not answer the purpose.

Mr. CLARK. That was the reason I made my suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON. So in relation to the several appropriations for Fort Winthrop, and Fort Independence, which he proposes to reduce. The sums which he appropriates might be so much money thrown away.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to taking the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maryland, and appropriating a gross sum for the works in Boston harbor, as proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. That mode of appropriating, though, renders the bill, so far as that appropriation is concerned, liable to the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire that it leaves the President to say where the expenditure shall be made.

I feel as anxious as the chairman of the Committee on Finance or as the member from Massachusetts can be that these appropriations shall not exceed the necessities of the country at this time; but I suppose, without knowing absolutely, that these several appropriations have been recommended as necessary by the proper department of the Government, the engineer department. I so understand. Now, it seems to me, that as we have a department of that description in which we have every confidence, and as they have advised that these several appropriations should be made, we ought to act on that advice without cutting down the appropriations, by the rule adopted by the Senator from Massachusetts, just one half.

Mr. President, while I am up, permit me to say a word as to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance. That amendment is to strike out all the appropriations and to place in the hands of the President $1,500,000, to be used by him as he in his opinion shall think is needed for the present war. He cannot spend a dollar of that $1,500,000 for any other purpose, except such purpose as he may think the present war requires. If I understand that provision, it means that he is to spend the money only as he may think proper in the present contest between the authority of the United States and the citizens of the United States who are in rebellion. I am far from believing that there is any certainty that we shall be involved in a foreign war, but it is by no means certain that we shall not be so involved. If we could tell when this civil war of ours would terminate, we should be able to tell with some approximation to certainty whether we should be involved in a foreign war or not. If this war is to go on for a year or two more, it is by no means certain that we shall not be involved in a foreign war. The information received from Europe from time to time, not official, but received from individual citizens who are there, and who profess to be acquainted with the purposes especially of the French Government, gives some reason to believe that the time will come, unless this war is soon terminated successfully on the part of the United States, when France may interpose. We adopted the other day, in the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, a provision which puts it out of the power of the President of the United States, and it was so designed, to send a minister to any other Government in Mexico than the republic of Mexico. The bill came from the House of Representatives in a different form, but it was amended in that particular by the Senate, and as far as I am advised there was no expressed dissent on the subject. That amendment has created some dissatisfaction in France, unreasonably I admit, but still in fact it exists, and it may in the end, if we refuse, as I have no doubt we shall, refuse to acknowledge the government of Maximilian, at least for some years to come, it may involve us in a difficulty with France, and if we shall be involved in a difficulty with France I think these fortifications will be needed.

The honorable Senator from California of course knows better than I do the actual condition of the harbor of San Francisco, but I know it sufficiently well to know that it is not protected now, and that it will require a very large expenditure to make it completely guarded as against a foreign foe; and instead of appropriating $300,000 or $400,000, which is the amount of this appropriation for the two forts in that harbor, the one on Fort Point and the other on the island of Alcatraz, if the harbor should get into the hands of a foreign foe, it would have been better for us to have prevented it by an expenditure of millions upon millions; for the possession of San Francisco by a foreign foe would be pretty much the possession of California. I do not mean it would be conquered, but for all practical purposes the State would be lost to the United States; and if a fleet consisting of iron-clads should get into that harbor, and they be as invulnerable as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs supposes them to be, all the force of this Government could not get them out.

It is true as he says, and as he proves, so far as we have a right to rely upon the testimony of the gentleman whose letter he read, and I have no doubt he is perfectly well skilled in such matters—it is true that iron-clads, with the armament they have on board, will be more than a match for any fixed fort with the armament our forts have now; but it is by no means true, as I think, and certainly it has not been demonstrated to be true, that artillery may not exist, or be brought into existence, that will have power enough to pierce those iron sides. The honorable member tells us that Fort Fisher was unable to resist the iron-clads that we brought against it. In one sense that is true, but in another sense it is not true. Fort Fisher was not taken by the Navy, and the Navy does not claim to have taken it. The guns of Fort Fisher were silenced, but the fort itself was not taken by the Navy. If the honorable member was here now, I would suggest to him what I suggest to the Senate: suppose that instead of its being Fort Fisher against which the six hundred or seven hundred guns of the American Navy poured such an incessant and destructive fire, there had been three or four or five iron-clads, equal to any that the British or French Governments have, how long do you think they would have withstood that fire? The Atlanta was supposed to be as strong as any iron-clad belonging to the American Navy, stronger, as our officers think, than any like vessel belonging either to the French or English navy, but two of our shot destroyed her; and the same missiles that were used against Fort Fisher, if used against iron-clads such as England or France has, or perhaps such as our iron-clads are, would have destroyed them. There never was such a bombardment as Fort Fisher was subjected to. In the history of naval warfare there never was such an instance before.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was an earthwork.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was an earthwork, I admit, but how long were we in taking Fort Sumter? That was not an earthwork. Half a dozen times it was reported as entirely destroyed, but it seemed to be stronger after it was destroyed than it was before. The received opinion in times past—I do not know how it is now—of engineers was that one gun on shore was equal to four guns afloat; and the difference between the capacity of our forts to meet the power of our iron-clads is not in the fact that the one is a fort and the other is a ship, but in the fact that the ship carries guns infinitely superior to any guns to be found now on our forts.

This bill appropriates I do not know how much for the harbor of New York. I think General Delafield will tell you, and no one is more skilled, that if this appropriation is used upon the forts in New York as it is proposed to be used, and guns of the caliber which we have, and which are now on board our iron-clads, are mounted there, no fleet could go by. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says that Fort Morgan did not stand the attack of Farragut. It did. Farragut did not take Fort Morgan. Fort Morgan was hardly hurt by his fire. He ran by with a gallantry never before excelled, and with a skill and a bravery never before equaled, but he did not take the fort; and if he had staid in front of the fort his whole fleet in all probability would have gone to the bottom; and nobody was more conscious of that, I am sure, than the gallant and never to be too much praised admiral. He did not take Fort Gaines. He could not take it. I heard the officer who led in the Brooklyn say—he said it to me—that they held a council of war before they made the attack, and the admiral proposed to him in the Brooklyn to lead the attack, to which he joyfully assented; but they were all under the impression that his vessel would be sunk. They intended to sacrifice her in order to make the attack successful; but there was not an officer on board the fleet who did not look to the sacrifice of the leading vessel as absolutely certain; and, as he says, nothing but the greatest good luck (for fortune seems to be with us in this war) prevented that catastrophe. The fort was hardly hurt.

In the Crimean war—I happened to be in England at that time—when Sir Charles Napier took the command of the fleet, it was said everywhere that he would take Cronstadt and get up to St. Petersburg; that it was impossible that those forts could stand against the power which the English fleet would bring to bear upon them; and there was great dissatisfaction with him—ever before gallant and daring; rashly gallant, rashly daring—because, when he came to see the danger before him, and the certainty of failure, he, acting in accordance with the advice of all his captains, decided that it would be madness to make the effort. He suffered for a time in reputation, but there was not a skillful engineer who did not believe that he came to the right conclusion, and that by so doing he saved the British fleet.

Mr. President, if we should have a war with England or with France, and the port of New York should only have the protection which it now has of the forts there in their present condition, I am by no means certain that a fleet could not run by the forts and lay the city under contribution; and to guard against the possibility of such a result, I would in any state of the Treasury vote any sum of money that the engineers deemed necessary to protect that city effectually. There may be, perhaps there are in this bill, appropriations for some forts that might well be postponed for a time; but keep our large cities against the hazard of disaster. New York in the possession of an enemy, and that enemy combined with the civil enemy against whom we are now warring, and the civil war would be a failure. A reduction then of the South to their allegiance would not be possible.

Therefore, sir, with every respect to the judgment of the Finance Committee, and my friend the chairman of that committee, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the committee, and also against the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts, in relation at least to some of these appropriations.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say in regard to the recommendation of General Delafield, that I think the records of Congress will show that during the last ten sessions Congress has not appropriated more than forty or fifty per cent. of the recommendations of the engineer department for fortifications. There is always a strong disposition on the part of the engineers to ask for large appropriations for fortifications, but at every Congress during the last ten years our appropriations have been much much less than the estimates of the department. I know that in some cases where they have been under consideration we have voted but a very small portion of the estimates. The question is for us to settle. I pay great deference to the opinion of General Delafield; I have a very high opinion of his skill and ability and devotion to the country; but in the present condition of the finances, I feel very much as the Senator from Ohio does, that we ought to spend as small a sum as we can possibly get along with and keep our fortifications in a fair condition. I have therefore moved this amendment which appropriates about fifty per cent. of the sums named in the original bill, and I shall vote for it, whether it meets the approbation of the Senate or not. I think that if the original bill had appropriated the sums now proposed by my amendment it would have been very cheerfully taken, without any attempt to enlarge it by the Senate. I have not a doubt upon that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that my amendment is to reduce the appropriation for each one of these fortifications about fifty per cent. from the amount named in the original bill, and it is not necessary, therefore, to read all the details.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Very well.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Davis, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Hartan, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Powell, Ramsey, Sausbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, and Wright—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Hendricks, McDougall, Morrill, and Nesmith—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand the state of the question now, it is on substituting the amendment of the Committee on Finance for the bill as amended on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. That amendment has reduced the amount appropriated in the original bill to about one half of what it proposed as it came from the House of Representatives. The amendment of the committee is based upon a different principle and contains a still further reduction. I do not wish to extend the discussion, but I will say that the bill as it now stands will appropriate about two million dollars, $1,500,000 of which is for fortifications on the northern line of defenses, leaving about four hundred thousand dollars for the southern line of defense; in other words, about four hundred thousand dollars of the appropriations contained in the bill as it now stands will be for the present war and about a million and a half for some future war, and the question recurs whether we ought now to expend $1,500,000 for repairing fortifications that may be needed in some future war. My honorable friend from Maryland imagines that we may have a war with France. I submit to the Senate whether we ought, in the present condition of the public finances, to vote $1,500,000 for the repair of fortifications not needed in the present war. As to the possibility of our being involved in a war with France or with England, I think it is a contingency so remote that we ought not now, when we have so much else to do, to provide for it. The attempt to do so reminds me very much of Mrs. Toodles, who was very fond of attending auctions. She attended one and bought a door-plate with the name of Thompson engraved on it, and when she came home she was called to task by her husband for the useless expenditure. She said that some day she might have a daughter, and that daughter might grow up, and might marry a man by the name of Thompson, and then it would be very handy to have the door-plate in the house. [Laughter.] I think in the midst of our present exigencies it is idle for us to incur expenditures in view of so remote a contingency as a foreign war. But even if we were involved in a foreign war, these fortifications in their present condition, or in any condition in which they are likely to be put for the next three or four years, are not probably the character of defense we shall rely upon. I have sufficiently discussed that matter already, and I only wish now to submit a single point.

The proposition of the Finance Committee has been carefully matured; it is not a novel one; the same provision precisely is contained in several appropriation bills for a number of years. For four years continuously we appropriated a small sum to keep our fortifications in repair. I think, from the beginning of our financial troubles in 1857, to 1860, no appropriations were made for these forts, and it was a very fortunate thing that it was so. If money had been expended on them it would have been money thrown away, because it is admitted that the present armament of those fortifications is insufficient and inefficient.

Under the circumstances, it is my duty to adhere to the amendment of the Finance Committee, although the amount in the original bill has been very much reduced by the amendment already adopted. The honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] in his very excited argument, insisted that I was striking at the system of fortifications, and discontinuing them entirely, abandoning our whole system of defense. I say to him that it is not so. We can suspend our fortifications, suspend our work upon them, without abandoning the whole system. I think at this time, especially, and for two or three years to come, there will be no occasion for continuing these works. They may without any great expense be put in a state of preservation. They are not in their nature perishable; they may be covered and protected from the weather, and work may be suspended on them without any material injury, and I think it is wise to do so. Without prolonging the debate, I am willing to take the vote upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to make one suggestion to the Senate in answer to the appeal of the Senator from Ohio, who says that if this bill pass as amended, we shall have but $300,000 at the control of the President for fortifications.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the South.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will turn his attention to page 5, he will find "for contingencies of fortifications, including field-works and field operations, $1,000,000" in addition.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is left in at any rate.

Mr. CLARK. That is left in, but it gives him a million more.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me explain to the Senator. It will be necessary, in my judgment, to repair Fort Sumter and to repair Fort Pulaski. If any money is to be expended on fortifications I would expend it on the fortifications at the mouth of the Mississippi, on Fort Pulaski, on Sumter, and on the forts at Mobile. There are no specific appropriations in this bill for those places, where money is needed and where money is indispensable for the present war. The words "field-works and field operations" do not include fortifications, and the words "contingencies of fortifications" constitute a specific term applicable only to a certain class of incidental expenses connected with fortifications, for instance, the payment of civil engineers; and unless the particular expenditure was covered by the term "contingencies" that appropriation would not enable the department to spend any portion of the $1,000,000 for building fortifications in the southern States. "Contingencies," as here used, is a technical term understood by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and that money cannot be expended for building fortifications. In my judgment, the amendment of the Committee on Finance, which has been carefully matured, and which will confine the operations of the Government to keeping the present fortifications in repair, and will place in its control a large sum to rebuild or build such fortifications as are needed down South for the present, is the wiser course.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator says he would rebuild Fort Sumter. I ask him what for.

Mr. SHERMAN. My own impression is that it may be necessary there, and may be the most convenient way to stop blockade runners going up.

Mr. CLARK. Is it any more necessary for that rebel city than the fortifications at the mouth of Portland harbor?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the works at Fort Sumter may be necessary for the protection of Charleston harbor, for defense even against the internal enemy. For instance, suppose it should be necessary to withdraw all our land forces from Charleston, as may perhaps be the case; we should then want some point within that harbor for the purpose of maintaining our hold there, and the point which can be manned with the least number of men; and therefore our military authorities might deem it very proper to fortify Fort Sumter, and hold it against the rebels.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator would also rebuild Fort Pulaski. What for, when we hold Savannah?

Mr. SHERMAN. For the same reasons.

Mr. CLARK. I would build an earthwork over Charleston, and put the city under it. That is the kind of fortification I would have. There is a chance for the Senator's earthworks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the vote is to

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 67.

be now taken between the report made by the Finance Committee and the bill as amended on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question.

Mr. COLLAMER. I may be very dull about it, but I do not understand the question. It is stated to be on the amendment as amended. I do not understand that the amendment has been amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state what he understands to be the precise position of the question. The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out certain items of appropriation in the bill as it stood when it came from the House of Representatives, and to insert other words. The words proposed to be stricken out were subject to amendment before the question was taken on striking them out, and they have been amended by reducing the various appropriations; and now the question returns on striking out the bill as amended, and inserting what the committee propose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Those in favor of the amendment of the Finance Committee will vote "yea," and those who are in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will vote "nay."

Mr. FARWELL. I wish to say a single word in regard to this bill. I appreciate the action of the Committee on Finance in proposing to reduce the appropriations. I believe it is now a time when the utmost care should be exercised in the appropriation of public money. I believe that every man who is capable of doing any labor should, so far as possibly can be done consistent with the interest of the country, be employed in those industries which will yield revenue, instead of in building works for future defense. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts in preference to the recommendation of the Finance Committee, for the reason that the difference in the appropriation is very small. If I have made the calculation aright the difference between the appropriations is but about four hundred thousand dollars, as between the proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts and that proposed by the Finance Committee. The sum proposed to be appropriated here in my judgment is sufficient. I think it is as much as can be economically and properly expended upon these fortifications during the present fiscal year; but I prefer that Congress itself should make the specifications of where the appropriations shall be used, and where the expenditures shall be made, rather than to leave it in the hands of the Executive, who has so much business upon his hands that he will have little opportunity to examine in regard to those matters. For this reason I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, rather than the recommendation of the committee.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Harris, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Richardson, Sausbury, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was also an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to strike out in line three the words, "the following sums be and they are," and to insert "there is," and to strike out in line five and six the words "for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications, and other works of defense."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Another amendment was made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out in line eighty-three the words "contingencies of fortifications, including."

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was one other amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the item:

For repairing, equipping, and enlarging Fort Porter, at Buffalo, $100,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In accordance with the principle that has been adopted on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I move to amend the item just acted on by reducing the sum for Fort Porter to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce; and had passed with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, the bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, and had agreed to other amendments of the Senate with amendments; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. J. S. MORRILL of Vermont, Mr. F. A. PIKE of Maine, and Mr. S. S. COX of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 746) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 788) for the relief of William Nicholls;

A bill (H. R. No. 790) for the relief of Henrietta O. Gardner; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to refer the claim of Armisted T. M. Filler to the Court of Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 314) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris;

A bill (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Mary Shircliff;

A bill (H. R. No. 543) to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army;

A bill (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector, to reside at Jersey City; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in relation to the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, junior, deceased.

REBECCA S. HARRISON.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison. The amendment diminishes the amount of pension to this widow a small sum, and I think it better to concur in the amendment than to lose the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their title, and referred as indicated:

A bill (H. R. No. 788) for the relief of William Nicholls—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 790) for the relief of Henrietta O. Gardner—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 746) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Agriculture.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to refer the claim of Armisted T. M. Filler to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on Claims.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, have met, and after full and free conference they have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives do recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate striking out sections five and nine of the House bill.

That the Senate do recede from its amendment proposed in section five of the bill as amended, and in lieu thereof adopt sections six, seven, and eight of the House bill.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in section six of the bill as amended, with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of the section the words "Provided, That said appeals shall be prosecuted, and said writs of error sued out at any time before the last day of July, 1866."

That the Senate concur in the above amendment.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in section seven of the bill as amended with an amendment, as follows: After the words "possessory action" in the second line insert the words "between individuals."

That the Senate do concur in the above amendment.

REVERDY JOHNSON,
WILLIAM M. STEWART,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WILLIAM HIGBY,
H. G. WORTHINGTON,
FRANCIS KERNAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is—

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say in regard to the report of the committee of conference just made, that I disagreed to it. I do not propose taking up the time of the Senate. I think it is wrong, and ought not to pass in the form in which it now is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That report has been agreed to, and passed from the Senate. The special order is now before the body.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the special order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana, and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator yield me the floor for a few minutes?

Mr. POWELL. It is now so near the hour for a recess that I prefer not addressing the Senate at this time. I give way.

CANAL SURVEYS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to take up now the joint resolution providing for surveys of the ship-canal, which was up last night, to which the Senator from Illinois then made objection; and I allowed it to go over until to-day. I do not think there will now be any objection to the passage of that joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to its passage now.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the special order be laid aside informally.

By unanimous consent, the special order was laid aside, and the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) to authorize surveys to be made with a view to the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal and improve the navigation of the Illinois river, to improve the Upper rapids and Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, and to improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read. I have not heard it yet.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment which I have not got here now, and I ask that the resolution be laid aside for a few moments that I may get the amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. While the Senator from Ohio is preparing his amendment, I move that the joint resolution in relation to Louisiana be postponed to and made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor on that question, and I presume he is ready to go on this evening.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I make the motion with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky. There is a special order in which we feel a great deal of interest for seven o'clock this evening, made so yesterday, and I hope this postponement will be had.

Mr. POWELL. I have been ready to go on all day, but there is not time between now and the hour fixed for the recess, and the Senator from Kansas has a special order for seven o'clock this evening. I am willing that the question upon which I have the floor shall be laid over until to-morrow at one o'clock, so as not to interfere with the special order for this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is that special order?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The special order for this evening is the bill to organize a territorial government for the Indian Territory south of Kansas, a very important bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should be very sorry to have this resolution lose its place. The Senator from Kansas certainly knows its importance, and I am a little surprised that he should make a motion to put it over. I presume the Senator from Kentucky is quite ready to go on this evening, not at this hour, perhaps, but at seven o'clock.

Mr. POWELL. Certainly; I shall be ready at seven o'clock this evening, or to-morrow, or at any other time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Kansas thinks this resolution had better go over until to-morrow, I am not disposed to contest about the order of business, and antagonize it with every measure that comes up here; but it seems to me that he must feel the importance of this Louisiana matter as much as I. I think we had better go on with it to-night.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to make a suggestion, and that is, that we now informally take up the Indian bill, and perhaps we can dispose of it before the recess, and let the Louisiana resolution be the special order for seven o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to propose to act on the Indian bill now?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If there be no objection. Mr. CONNESS. Since it is so near the time for the recess, I hope that will not be taken up now. I wish to call up a bill that was partly acted upon last evening. Having arrived with the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands at a conclusion in regard to the necessary amendments to it, it will not occupy any time now; and if it can be taken up I shall regard it as a great accommodation. I have labored for two weeks to get it up, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to call it up at this time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will aid the Senator in calling it up to-morrow morning in the morning hour; but I think the Indian bill has been pretty well perfected. Two or three amendments have been suggested to me to the bill, and I have consulted with Senators on the subject, and I think it can be disposed of before the recess.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there will be no difficulty in disposing of it.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will give way on this occasion to the Senator from California.

Mr. FOSTER. The Indian bill to which reference is made is a very important bill, and can hardly be disposed of in fifteen minutes. It is a bill which changes our whole Indian policy. It violates the plighted faith of the United States in various particulars. It is a bill which, in regard to the Indian tribes within the country that it proposes to organize as a new Territory, will do great injustice, and, it seems to me, will cast great dishonor on the United States if we pass it. It certainly ought not to be hurried through in ten or fifteen minutes. It is a bill that was introduced into this body on the 20th day of February, reported on the 22d, and printed and laid on our tables yesterday; a bill containing some fourteen sections and some fourteen pages. I submit that fifteen minutes is a little too short a time in which to put a bill of that sort through the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will give way at present that I may call up the bill to which I have alluded.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall not attempt to call up my bill if there is opposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would require unanimous consent at this stage of business.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the Senate bill No. 380; it will occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have a motion pending, and I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Illinois. The result will be that the Senator from Kentucky will make his speech to-night, and the yeas and nays will be called, and we shall find ourselves without a quorum. I propose to make the resolution the special order for one o'clock to-morrow, and then he can go on with his speech, and we can take a vote and pass this resolution.

Mr. WILSON. There will be several speeches on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the further consideration of this joint resolution until one o'clock to-morrow, and making it the special order for that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am now prepared to submit my amendment to the joint resolution which was under consideration a few moments ago, and was laid aside at my suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not up; the question before the Senate is on the joint resolution in regard to the recognition of the State government of Louisiana.

Mr. FOSTER. If the resolution in regard to the State of Louisiana is postponed, I hope the bankrupt bill will take its place. It is a bill which for a long time I have been watching for a reasonable opportunity to bring to the notice of the Senate; and if the joint resolution in relation to Louisiana is postponed, I shall certainly take the risk, at all events, of antagonizing it with any question that I know of which can be brought up against it, and I hope that if the Louisiana question is postponed, it will be for the purpose of taking up the bankrupt bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to postpone Senate joint resolution No. 117 until to-morrow at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that motion will not prevail. The Senator from Illinois is totally opposed to it. He says he is opposed to all special orders; he has told us so over and over again; and I am sure the Senate will not offend the Senator from Illinois by adopting this motion. I hope that the resolution will be postponed until to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, or next week, or next year, but without making it a special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall be very happy to agree with my friend from Michigan. I shall vote with him against postponing this resolution until to-morrow and making it the special order at that time. I think it very important to have action upon this Louisiana matter. I have so stated several times to the Senate. If it shall go over until to-morrow, I am apprehensive that something then will interfere with it and we shall get no action. We have been crowded out of to-day, and I think now that we have got it up we had best hold to it. I have been spoken to by members of the Senate who have said to me that if it goes by we shall never get action in the Louisiana case. We are drawing toward the close of the session, and I think it best when it is in order, as it is now before us, to hold on to it. I am willing to let it be informally laid aside and proceed to the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Ohio; but I am not willing that it shall lose its place; and I hope the Senate will not agree to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SUMNER. If we are to make any special order for to-morrow I think it should be the bill which the Senate has most maturely considered, and on which it is most prepared to vote. That is the bill known as the railroad bill, in charge of my friend from Michigan. The Senator from Illinois came forward with his measure—

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me—I know he will—to appeal to him not to waste the fifteen minutes we have left in discussing the order of business, but let us take a vote? I have been ground out between harder substances than I am composed of here a dozen times, and I am trying to call up a bill of great consequence to my people which will not occupy five minutes.

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. SUMNER.) Give up.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators say "Give up." That is not my habit.

Mr. CONNESS. We know that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to withdraw my motion?

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Indian bill is the special order for this evening.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to understand the order of business. I dare say there are many Senators who would be interested in the Indian bill—

Mr. CONNESS. I appeal to my friend not to consume our time in this way.

Mr. SUMNER. If the motion is withdrawn, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 380.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be taken up by unanimous consent, so as not to displace the regular order.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us finish the matter we have in hand. I delayed the Senate by sending for an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. To accommodate the Senator from California, I will let the resolution referred to by the Senator from Ohio go over until after dinner.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to take up informally the bill he has indicated. The Chair hears no objection.

TOWN LOTS IN CALIFORNIA.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 380) to give title to the occupants of lots in cities and towns in the State of California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the question pending to be on an amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment. I am content with one which will be proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe I had the honor of submitting an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That fell with the withdrawal of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed the question would come up on my amendment when he withdrew his.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me state to the Senator from Indiana that the amendment I am now about to offer is one prepared by the Senator from Iowa, which will, in all probability, meet the whole case that the Senator from Indiana wants to provide for. I move to insert, after the word "interior" in the twelfth line of the second section of the amendment of the committee, the words:

Provided, That the minimum price of each of said lots, in any such town, which may contain a greater number of square feet than the maximum named in the act to which this is an amendment, shall be increased to such reasonable amount as the Secretary of the Interior may by rule establish.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I move, further, to amend the amendment by inserting the word "further" after "provided," in line twelve of section two. It is a mere verbal amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made without a vote.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: "A bill supplemental to the act approved July 1, 1864, for the disposal of coal lands and of town property in the public domain."

CANAL SURVEYS.

Mr. FOSTER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill. We can just read it through before the recess.

Mr. WILSON. I desire now to take up the joint resolution which I consented to lay over.

Mr. FOSTER. My motion is to proceed with the bankrupt bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That cannot be done without the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, who is entitled to the floor on the question before the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to pass the resolution which was taken up on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution in relation to Louisiana is properly before the Senate, and upon that the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor, and no Senator can move to postpone it without his consent.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the consent of the Senator from Kentucky to put this joint resolution on its passage.

Mr. POWELL. I yield for that purpose.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 132) to authorize surveys to be made with a view to the construction of a ship canal around the falls of Niagara, to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, and improve the navigation of the Illinois river, to improve the Upper rapids and Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, and to improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I offer my amendment as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three competent officers of the Navy and two competent officers of the Engineer corps of the Army, to examine the different ports and harbors of the northern and northwestern lakes, and upon the navigable rivers connecting the same, with a view to the establishment of one or more navy-yards or naval depots on said lakes and waters, according to the public exigencies; and that said commissioners report to Congress on the first Monday in December next.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will adopt that amendment of my friend from Ohio. I think the time has come when there should be an attempt made to establish a naval depot on those western waters.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that question has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and my impression is, though I am not sure about it, that the chairman of that committee is not favorable to the proposition. I do not see him in the Senate, and I would desire that he should be present when it is acted upon. The amendment is not necessarily connected with the joint resolution. The resolution is in relation to surveys for ship-canals; the amendment is in regard to a navy-yard or naval depot.

Mr. SHERMAN. It all involves the same general question as to naval defenses on the lakes. I have no interest in the matter, and really do not know how I shall vote on the resolution itself; but I am willing to get full information on the whole subject. I do not think the Senator from Iowa can be opposed to a simple inquiry by a commission. The proposition which I have offered has already passed the House of Representatives, I think unanimously, without objection, as a separate measure. I see no objection to it. It costs nothing because the officers of the Navy are already in the public service, and they will simply be detailed to make this examination.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the question belongs to the Naval Committee. However, I have suggested all that I desire on this subject; it is for the Senate to decide.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 419) for the better organization of the pay department of the United States Army, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask for its consideration now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have no time to pass that now before half past four o'clock, and at seven o'clock the Senator from Kentucky will be entitled to the floor on the Louisiana question, as I understand, notwithstanding the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He will be, because that resolution is the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, but before concluding the reading, (the hour of half past four o'clock having arrived,) the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of citizens of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying for the establishment of a house of refuge or reform school for juvenile offenders; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented a memorial of Joel Parker, Governor of New Jersey, and others, appointed commissioners to sell scrip donated by Congress for the establishment of an agricultural college in New Jersey, praying that the restriction on the location of said scrip may be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) At the time the Senate took a recess the Secretary was reading a bill which had been taken up on motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] and he will continue the reading of that bill unless there be objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I move, with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] who is entitled to the floor on the regular order of business, to take up the Senate bill No. 465, which is simply to create the office of Solicitor and Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department, to which there will be no objection.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to complete the consideration of the bill which was taken up on my motion just before the recess. It will take no time of the Senate, and there will be no opposition to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) to recognize the State government of Louisiana is the business regularly before the Senate, and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] is entitled to the floor, and no other business can be entertained except by unanimous consent and with his permission.

Mr. POWELL. I will give way.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Senator from Kentucky gives way for this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator refer to the paymasters' bill which was up before the recess?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. That will be debated.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think not.

Mr. GRIMES. I know it will be.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think there will be no objection to it with an amendment that I intend to propose to it.

Mr. HARLAN. I thought there was a special order fixed for seven o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of the session takes precedence of the special order; and the unfinished business is Senate joint resolution No. 117, upon which the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor; and anything done must be done with his consent.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report, if there be no objection.

RIGHT OF WAY TO PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 120) to authorize the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, to acquire certain right of way and land from the incompetent Wyandotte Indians, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It will provoke no discussion.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot be considered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will withdraw my objection to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, provided it will not take precedence of my bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It will take but a minute to dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This whole proceeding is irregular and out of order, and no business can be done except the regular order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution which I have reported.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I shall object, if it takes precedence of the bill that was before the Senate when the recess was taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will take the place of it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Then I object, and I trust we shall go on with that bill.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the States, and make it the special order for to-morrow evening at seven o'clock. There are two Senators who desire to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Make it eleven o'clock, and I will agree to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I prefer seven.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall object to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to make it the special order for to-morrow evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot tell what our situation to-morrow evening will be. Let us wait until to-morrow evening comes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, and insisted on the amendments disagreed to by the House, and non-concurred in the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to appoint the committee of conference on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. SHERMAN, GRIMES, and HENDRICKS, were appointed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, reported it with amendments; and on his motion the bill was made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I now ask for the continuation of Senate bill No. 419.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of that bill will be proceeded with, unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill (S. No. 419) for the better organization of the pay department of the United States Army. It provides that the Paymaster General of the United States Army shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general.

It further provides that there shall be added to the pay department of the United States Army, as now organized, two assistant paymaster generals, who shall be ex officio inspector generals of the department, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of infantry. In addition to the two deputy paymaster generals now authorized, there are to be added ten others, subject to the same conditions and provisions as by existing laws provided for deputy paymaster generals.

The appointments to the offices herein created are to be made by selection from the officers of the pay department of the United States Army, including the additional paymasters and the chief clerk, and who have had at least two years' service and experience in the duties of the pay department. After such appointments have been once filled, all vacancies occurring are to be supplied as now by law prescribed for the other staff departments of the Army.

The assistant and deputy paymaster generals are to give bond in the manner now required of deputy paymaster generals, and to be subject to any duty in the pay department to which they may be assigned by the Secretary of War.

Whenever a pay district is established, for the charge, superintendence, and command of which no assistant or deputy paymaster general is available as chief, the Secretary of War may detail any paymaster or additional paymaster of the Army to do the duties of such chief; and during the continuance of such detail and duties, and no longer, the officer so detailed is to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a deputy paymaster general; but the total number of such acting deputies is not at any one time to exceed ten.

The Secretary of War is to have authority to detail officers of such department, not exceeding four at any one time, who, during the continuance of such detail and duties, are to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of deputy paymaster generals; and they, together with the inspector generals herein provided for, are to have the powers and authority within their own department now by law and regulations conferred upon inspector generals of the Army.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to amend the bill by inserting in section three, line six, after the word "department," the following:

Provided, That at least two thirds of such appointments shall be made from the additional or volunteer paymasters; and

So that the section will read:

That the appointments to the offices herein created shall be made by selection from the officers of the pay department of the United States Army, including the additional paymasters and the chief clerk, and who shall have had at least two years' service and experience in the duties of the pay department: Provided, That at least two thirds of such appointments shall be made from the additional or volunteer paymasters; and after such appointments have been once filled, all vacancies occurring shall be supplied as now by law prescribed for the other staff departments of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move further to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall continue and be in force during the continuance of the present rebellion, and one year thereafter, and no longer: Provided, however, That when this act shall expire all officers who have been promoted from the pay staff of the Army under this act shall retain their respective rank in the Army, with such promotion as they would have been entitled to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, this bill has had the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs. They have reported it to the Senate unanimously. The amendment has the concurrence of the chairman and every member of that committee. The bill has received the sanction of the War Department. The Secretary of War is anxious that it shall pass. There is no objection to it anywhere. The increase of pay is very slight and very small. All that is desired for this department is a superior organization. It has become necessary from its increased duties, owing to the increased number of officers in the department and the immense amount of Government disbursements. All that is called for by this department, and granted by this bill, is to cease immediately after this war, or one year thereafter, simply giving them sufficient time to enable the accounts to be adjusted and to be made up properly. There cannot be the slightest objection to it. The quartermaster's department, the commissary department, the medical department, all the departments of the Army, have been reorganized, except the paymaster's department. This bill has received the sanction of the War Department, and of the paymaster's department; and they ask it in order to enable them to carry on the department successfully. As I have said, the chairman of the committee favored it; the whole Military Committee favored it; the War Department asks for it. There can be no objection to it. The increase of the number of officers and the increase of pay is all to end with the war. I really hope that there will be no objection from my friend the Senator from Iowa.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the yeas and nays are to be called, I am apprehensive it may interfere with the transaction of business; and I trust that they will either not be called, or else the bill will now be laid aside and the Senate take up the regular order of business.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let us have a division.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend there is not a quorum.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not content with a division. I want to record my name on a ye and nay vote against these continual attempts to build up grand, stupendous military establishments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that we take the yeas and nays upon the bill at some future time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let us pass the bill now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You have not a quorum and cannot pass it, and the only effect will be merely to stop the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill was taken up by unanimous consent, and cannot be proceeded with if there be objections.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of the day is called for, and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That cannot be done while the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor. It was by unanimous consent that this paymaster's bill was called up.

Mr. SPRAGUE. My motion is to postpone the consideration of this bill for the paymaster's department, and I believe I have the floor on that question. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be laid aside informally until there is a quorum, and then we can take the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the further consideration of the bill in relation to the paymaster's department be postponed until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY TO PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the joint resolution which I reported a short time ago from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will go on with his remarks on the special order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This resolution will provoke no discussion at all, and it is a matter of importance, which should go to the other House as soon as possible.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We are having this difficulty all the time, and if we are content to give way to these bills we shall never finish the business of the session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution indicated by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I would like to say to the Senator from Illinois that it is merely a resolution to allow the Pacific railroad to procure the right of way through a piece of land.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose there is any objection to the resolution itself; but if we are to keep giving way to allow bills to be interpolated, we shall never get through with the measure that is properly before the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This resolution will provoke no discussion, and I should like to have it passed. I hope the Senator from Illinois will give his consent to allow it to be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor, and I will not interpose if he does not; but I do not like to have bills interposed in this way.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have the permission of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. POWELL. It will take but a moment, I am informed, and with that understanding I will give way.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 120) to authorize the Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, to acquire certain right of way and land from the incompetent Wyandotte Indians. It proposes to authorize the Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, to purchase of the incompetent Wyandotte Indians, upon such terms as shall be approved by the President, the right of way for the railroad, and such other grounds and materials as such incompetents may possess, which shall be necessary to the company in the construction and operation of its road, not exceeding one hundred acres.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to be troublesomely inquisitive; but I should like to know the difference between a competent and an incompetent Wyandotte Indian? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will ask that the letter of Secretary Usher on this subject be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 16, 1865.

SIR: It having become important, in the construction of their road and its branches, that the Union Pacific Railway Company occupy a portion of the lands of the Wyandotte Indians in Kansas; and as I meet with some difficulty in view of existing treaty stipulations in approving any conveyance of their land, I have prepared and herewith present the draft of a joint resolution to remove all difficulty in the matter and have the honor to request that it be put upon its passage.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER.

HON. J. H. LANE, United States Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. That throws no light whatever upon the inquiry I made.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The treaty with the Wyandotte Indians gives to certain of them who follow a certain track the power to possess themselves of the right to convey their lands. A portion of these Indians, who have not yet gone through that ceremony, own a portion of the land through which the road desires to pass; and it is to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the contract they have made that this joint resolution is offered. They, however, I desire to say to the Senator from Connecticut, are as well qualified to transact their own business as he or I.

Mr. FOSTER. The "incompetent Wyandotte Indians" then, as I understand, are perfectly competent. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Except in this legal, technical sense.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I certainly do not wish to treat this matter with any levity. I suppose that these Indians are destined to lose all their lands, and to be exterminated; but it did seem to me that there was at least a little decency to be observed in pursuing these Indians to their last ditch. If we are to take away the rights of those who are deemed incompetent by a resolution here that is read and really unnoticed by anybody, it seems that I was mistaken in my apprehension. I certainly do not wish to stand in the way of this legislation if it is deemed proper. If it is satisfactory to other Senators I certainly will not oppose it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there a report from the committee in this case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is no report accompanying the resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not willing that this resolution shall pass after the statements that have been made by the Senator from Connecticut, without looking into it personally, as I am a member of the committee that usually has charge of that business. I suppose the Senator from Kansas has satisfied himself that it is all right; but it has not been considered in the committee formally. I know the Senator from Kansas has the consent of the members of the committee to report it to the Senate; but the Senator from Connecticut doubtless has looked into the subject somewhat, or he would not make the grave statements that he has made here to-night; and therefore I ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not looked at it, and it was because I knew nothing about it that I made the inquiry.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to its going over; but I desire to say that this road passes through the lands of the Wyandotte Indians, and this joint resolution is intended to cover the right of way and depot grounds that they have already dedeed. That is all there is in it. Instead of being a disadvantage to the Indians, it will be a very great advantage to them.

Mr. COWAN. Are these Indians within the State of Kansas and within her jurisdiction?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. Are there no courts to protect them in the exercise of their rights in dealing with this company? Cannot they convey the land through the medium of the courts there?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No, sir; that is what I undertook to state to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. COWAN. Does this resolution confer the power on the courts, or does it confer it absolutely from here?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Secretary of the Interior is to grant the patent.

Mr. COWAN. I would rather that it should be given to the courts.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the resolution will go over until to-morrow, in order to explain this matter to the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Iowa, as to who are competent or incompetent Indians under the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and objection being made, it will lie over until to-morrow.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. POWELL. I will ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A.D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, at all times I regret to differ with my colleagues of the Committee on the Judiciary, and particularly do I regret it when I differ from them upon a question of such grave importance as the one now under consideration. Being the only member of the committee that was opposed to the resolution, I feel it my duty in a very brief manner to state to the Senate the reasons why I cannot support it. The chief object in recognizing the State government of Louisiana at this time is to allow that State to vote for the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and to do that effectually the friends of the resolution desire first to admit Senators and Representatives from that State. The admission of Senators and Representatives from Louisiana will be the immediate result of the passage of the resolution.

The resolution under consideration proposes to recognize as the legitimate State government of Louisiana the government formed by the convention that assembled in New Orleans on the 6th day of April, 1864. In order to come to a just and correct conclusion upon the question at issue we must be informed of the action of the people of Louisiana, of the President of the United States, and of the military, in connection with this subject. I have no hesitancy in saying there is no Senator in this Chamber who would be more rejoiced than myself if the people of Louisiana were to cease their hostility to the Government and return to the Union and elect members to this body and the other House, and ask for their admission. But, sir, believing as I do that the government that is proposed to be recognized by this resolution is not a government formed by the people of Louisiana, I oppose it. It may be, and I dare say it is true, that some gentlemen who oppose this resolution do it for reasons that do not animate me. There are some, I dare say, who believe that Louisiana is out of the Union. I am not one of those. With the permission of the Senate I will read a very brief extract from a speech I made on the 2d day of this month, in which I alluded to that subject:

"I believe that the States in revolt are still States of the Union. I believe they are not out of the Union. I believe, furthermore, that when they choose to lay down their arms and to elect officers of their State governments who acknowledge this Government, and to send members to the House of Representatives, and Senators to this Chamber, they have the right to do so, and I believe that they ought to be permitted to do so. While I say that, I know of course that each House is the judge of the qualifications of its members, and each House is to judge for itself whether the resistance to the Government in any State has sufficiently ceased to entitle it to representation here, and hence it is that each case must stand upon its own merits as it is presented here. For myself, I would vote to-morrow to receive Senators in this Hall from every State that is in revolt, provided I believed that a majority of the people of those States, unawed by the military power, uninfluenced by any outward force, of their own good will, in the exercise of their own volition, had in good faith elected those men in the way prescribed by their constitution and laws."

Something approximating a majority of the people of the State should indicate a willingness to return to the Union, and should participate in the movement of reorganization.

And further, I remarked:

"Believing that these States are States in the Union, that they are not out of the Union, whenever a majority of the people in either one of these States shall of their own free will cease to resist the authorities and Government of the United States, and shall elect of their own free will Senators and Representatives to Congress, I will only inquire as to the fact whether they have ceased their resistance, and whether a majority of the people have determined to be loyal to the Constitution and Government of the United States; and that fact being established so as to leave no doubt upon my mind, I would then be ready to admit their Representatives as our equals here."

I still adhere to the position taken then. It would afford me great pleasure to admit upon this floor Representatives from Louisiana and to recognize in every way in which it was possible for me to do so the organization of the State government of Louisiana, provided I believed the loyal people there of their own free will had formed the government and had elected their Representatives. But, Mr. President, as I have before stated, I do not believe that the loyal people of Louisiana, of their own free will, uninfluenced by the military power, formed the government which it is now proposed to recognize. I believe that the formation of that government was controlled and influenced by others; and that those persons who exercised absolute control in this matter were not citizens of Louisiana. It is a government formed really and virtually by the military power of the United States, using as instruments delegates who were elected under and by force of the bayonet.

Senators, before they can vote for this resolution, must maintain the doctrine contained in the President's proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863, when he proposed that one-tenth of the loyal voters of a State who would comply with the conditions set forth in his proclamation should form a State government. They must further maintain that the President of the United States of his own volition has power by decretal order to alter the constitution of a State. They must maintain further that the President of the United States has the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters and the qualifications of candidates for office in the States. They must further believe not only that the President possesses those powers, but that Major General Banks possessed those powers in the State of Louisiana by virtue of his office as major general of the army commanding in that district. I will show you, sir, beyond the possibility of a doubt that the people of Louisiana who cooperated in forming this State government did not act of their own free volition, but they were coerced to do what they did. I will show you that the constitution formed and presented here, and which, it is said, is the fundamental law of the State of Louisiana, was not a constitution made by the free suffrages of the people of that State.

The creation of a State government is a purely civil act, and has no connection with military or martial law. The people must act without restraint. I suppose there is no Senator here who will deny that proposition. All those who admit that the formation of a State government is a purely civil act, and that the military authorities have no right to control it in any way whatever, must if they are consistent vote to reject the resolution proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

I have heard the proclamation that accompanied the President's annual message on the 8th of December, 1863, commented on in this Chamber by numerous Senators, and I have heard no Senator maintain that the President could legitimately exercise the power he has assumed in that proclamation. The President in that proclamation, the Senate will remember, proposes if one tenth of the qualified voters of a State in revolt shall take the oath prescribed in the proclamation, and shall proceed to form a State government, to recognize that State government. Sir, what is that oath? Let us look at it for a moment. It is in these words:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear, in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God."

The taking of that oath was a condition precedent to becoming a qualified elector in one of these revolted States. The first part of that oath is not objectionable; but that portion of it which provides that a man shall swear to support all the proclamations of the President of the United States on the subject of slavery, and all the proclamations that he may hereafter make on that subject, is certainly a most odious feature; it is certainly most degrading to any man who takes it. I hold that no man who is a free man and understands all of his civil and political rights would so prostitute himself as to take that oath. The President not only requires him to swear that he will support the proclamations that have been made on the subject of slavery, but that he will support those hereafter to be made. What man who has proper self-respect will swear that he will support all the proclamations that any Executive may make in the future upon any given subject? Why, sir, the President may proclaim that the negro shall be the master and the white man the slave; that the negro shall be the voter and the white man deprived of the right of suffrage; and yet this oath requires the man taking it to swear in advance that he would support even such a measure as that. I suppose there is no Senator that ever has defended, or ever will defend, that odious feature of this oath, which, sir, the President prescribes as a condition precedent to becoming a qualified voter in any one of these revolted States under his system of reconstruction. I hope the Senate will bear in mind that the government in Louisiana which is now proposed to be recognized is the first-fruits of the proclamation of the President. The government presented here is formed upon that proclamation.

Now, sir, let us look a little further at this proclamation:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in nowise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.'"

You will observe that the President here lays down as a fundamental principle that one tenth of the number of voters that voted in 1860, if they submit themselves to this humiliating oath, shall form a State government. That is much less than one tenth of the voters of the State, because I suppose there never was an election in which all the voters of a State went to the polls and cast their votes. At the very threshold, then, you repudiate the great principle of republican government, that majorities shall rule. Here you propose to say not that majorities, but that less than one tenth shall rule. The President then proceeds to intimate very clearly, in his proclamation, that when they form a constitution it must not recognize African slavery. General Banks, carrying out the suggestion of the President and what he had distinctly stated in a letter to General Steele in relation to Arkansas, took it upon himself to alter the constitution of Louisiana in that respect.

Mr. President, I ask those who are in favor of this resolution to tell me from whence the President of the United States derives the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters for the people of Louisiana. Whence does he derive the power to prescribe the qualifications for office? And yet all these things he does. Why, sir, he tells you plainly and distinctly in that proclamation that none shall be qualified voters except those who take the oath prescribed in that proclamation. I can recognize no government as legitimate that has such a rotten foundation. Senators who vote for it must admit that the President possesses these high powers of sovereignty. I have heretofore thought and now maintain that there is no power on earth that can lawfully form a constitution for the people of any State in this Union save and except the sovereign people themselves. It is one of the highest acts of the sovereignty of the people to proclaim their fundamental law; but here in this pretended government of Louisiana the Chief Executive of the United States undertakes to prescribe the qualification of voters and to amend the constitution of Louisiana. When he prescribes the qualification of voters he amends the constitution of the State; for under the constitution of that State as it existed before the rebellion the qualification of voters was prescribed in that instrument. The President's proclamation is the basis of the whole proceeding, and those who vote for this resolution indorse that proclamation. There is no escape from it. I will show you that the whole proceeding was conducted under and by virtue of that proclamation, and with a purpose to carry it out.

Let us see what Major General Banks did. In order to carry out the proclamation of the President, applying it practically to Louisiana, Major General Banks, in obedience to instructions from the President, undertook to reorganize a State government in Louisiana. On the 11th day of January, 1864, he issued his proclamation calling upon the people of Louisiana to elect a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, secretary of State, treasurer, attorney general, superintendent of public instruction, and auditor of public accounts. I will read that proclamation:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, January 11, 1864.

To the people of Louisiana:

1. In pursuance of authority vested in me by the President of the United States, and upon consultation with many representative men of different interests, being fully assured that more than a tenth of the population desire the earliest possible restoration of Louisiana to the Union, I invite the loyal citizens of the State qualified to vote in public affairs, as hereinafter prescribed, to assemble in the election precincts designated by law, or at such places as may hereafter be established, on the 22d day of February, 1864, to cast their votes for the election of State officers herein named, namely:—

They are the officers I have just named.

"who shall, when elected, for the time being, and until others are appointed by competent authority, constitute the civil government of the State, under the constitution and laws of Louisiana, except so much of the said constitution and laws as recognize, regulate, or relate to slavery, which, being inconsistent with the present condition of public affairs, and plainly inapplicable to any class of persons now existing within its limits, must be suspended, and they are therefore, and hereby declared to be, inoperative and void."

Major General Banks tells you that the part of the constitution of Louisiana referred to in the extract just read from his proclamation is not applicable to any class of persons in the State, and then declares it inoperative and void. If not applicable to any class of persons in the State, why the necessity of declaring it inoperative and void. He must have done it to let the people of Louisiana know that he was a usurper, a tyrant, and a ruthless and wanton violator of the Constitution of his country and every principle of civil and republican liberty, and to let them know that they had a master whose will they must obey. Who clothed Nathaniel P. Banks, major general of the Army of the United States, with the power to amend the constitution of the State of Louisiana? N. P. Banks, in his capacity as major general of the Army of the United States, had no more legal power to proclaim an amendment of the constitution of Louisiana than he had to annul or amend the fiat of Almighty God. That is a power that the sovereign people of Louisiana alone possess. And yet, sir, this major general, in obedience to the edict of his master, the President, with one dash of his pen alters, or attempts to alter, the constitution of the State of Louisiana. I put it to you, Senators, you who acknowledge the sovereignty of the people to be the cornerstone, the foundation, upon which must be reared all the institutions of all the States of this Union, to say whether you will sanction such an outrage upon every principle of republican government. Major General Banks, who had no authority on the face of the earth to speak in this matter in the State of Louisiana, who was not a citizen of Louisiana, but a citizen of Massachusetts, assumes to amend the constitution of the State. Was there ever such an audacious usurpation? I will venture to say you may search the history of major generals from time immemorial to the present moment, and you will find in no Government where it is pretended that liberty is regulated by law such a monstrous usurpation as that of General Banks in Louisiana.

But, sir, let me read a little further from this proclamation:

"II. The oath of allegiance prescribed by the President's proclamation, with the condition affixed to the elective franchise by the constitution of Louisiana, will constitute the qualification of voters in this election. Officers elected by them will be duly installed in their offices on the 4th day of March, 1864."

He says that the qualification of the voter is such as is prescribed in the proclamation of the President in addition to the qualifications prescribed by the constitution of Louisiana. Here this major general recognizes the existence of the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The President of the United States himself recognized the existence of those State constitutions in his proclamation. Major General Banks recognizes the constitution of the State as being the fundamental law, for he allows it to stand, except so far as he shall proclaim it modified. Now, sir, can you deny that there was a constitution in the State of Louisiana? Had the rebellion overthrown that constitution, he could, with some consistency, have gone on to make a constitution from his stand-point, he believing, as he said, that martial law was the fundamental law of Louisiana, and martial law being the will of the Commander-in-Chief.

But he recognizes the constitution of Louisiana and then proceeds solemnly to decree the amendment that I have read.

But that is not all that this major general does. He says, further:

"IV. In order that the organic law of the State may be made to conform to the will of the people, and harmonize with the spirit of the age, as well as to maintain and preserve the ancient landmarks of civil and religious liberty, an election of delegates to a convention for the revision of the constitution will be held on the first Monday of April, 1864. The basis of representation, the number of delegates, and the details of election, will be announced in subsequent orders."

Senators, what think you of that? "In order to maintain and preserve the ancient landmarks of civil and religious liberty" Major General Banks orders delegates to be elected to form a constitution for the State of Louisiana! I ask the friends of this resolution who it was that conferred upon Major General Banks the power to call together a convention to remodel the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The constitution of the State of Louisiana can only, lawfully, be amended in the mode pointed out in the instrument itself. I am sure there is no clause in the constitution of Louisiana that authorizes a major general of the United States to order the people to elect delegates to remodel their constitution. And yet, sir, we are to sanction all these usurpations before we can vote for the resolution now under consideration.

This major general proclaims that the qualifications of the voter is such as is prescribed in the constitution of Louisiana as altered by the amnesty proclamation of the President. That he declares on the 11th day of January, 1864. On the 13th day of February, 1864, only a month afterward, he issues another ukase in which he adds other qualifications to voters. I beg Senators to listen to this. He not only adds the qualifications prescribed by the President, but he, General Banks, adds other qualifications to voters. There were a certain class of people in Louisiana who were forbidden by the constitution of that State to vote. They were those engaged in the Army and Navy. The President does not in his proclamation allow those persons to vote, notwithstanding they take the amnesty oath, because they were not legal voters under the constitution of Louisiana. General Banks, on the 11th of January, issued his proclamation prescribing the qualifications of a voter as they were indicated in the proclamation of the President; but, sir, he could not even stand to that, because before the election came on he issued an order in which he speaks further on that subject. I will read a portion of his order of the 13th of February:

"III. Citizens of the State who have volunteered for the defense of the country in the Army or Navy, and who are otherwise qualified voters, will be allowed to vote in the election precincts in which they may be found on the day of election; and if the exigencies of the public service be such as to prevent their attendance at any established precinct, then commissioners fairly representing the interests involved in the election will be appointed to receive their votes wherever they may be stationed on that day, and to make due returns thereof, as well as of their own votes, to the military governor of the State, as provided for other commissioners of election."

There you observe that General Banks allows persons that were not qualified voters under the President's amnesty proclamation, to vote. He allows those in the Army and Navy, who are forbidden by the constitution of Louisiana from voting, to vote. Under the President's amnesty proclamation those persons were not qualified voters, because the President allowed all to vote who had taken that oath who were qualified by the constitution of the State of Louisiana. Certain persons were not allowed the privilege of the amnesty oath at all. That applied to officers of high grade in the army, and others whom I will not specify. General Banks was not content with carrying out what the President indicated, but he must enlarge the right of voting in this particular, and thus violating upon his own account, not in obedience to the order of the President, the constitution of Louisiana.

I am aware that General Banks in his statement, which I will review presently, tells you that the military made no interference in the election in Louisiana—much less, perhaps, than in any other State in the Union. I ask Senators to look at this paragraph of the order of February 13, 1864:

"VI. The sheriffs of the several parishes, and in their absence the provost marshals, will take especial care that the polls are promptly opened, and that suitable judges of election and other officers are appointed."

What is that provost marshal doing there? "The sheriffs and the provost marshals." Why, sir, you see the military all through the matter. Is the provost marshal an officer known to the constitution and laws of Louisiana to supervise elections? No, sir; no.

These State officers were elected; and how many votes were cast in that election? I find upon examination that there was then within the Federal lines less than one third of the territory of Louisiana. I find that at that election there were cast 11,414 votes, 808 of which were soldiers' votes; who, under the President's proclamation, were not legal voters, leaving 10,606 votes. Eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes, all told, were cast at that election. There must be about 60,000 voters in Louisiana. That State sometimes cast as high as 51,000 votes; and I suppose there never was and never will be an election where all the qualified voters go to the polls.

What does General Banks do after this election? Does he turn over affairs to the civil authorities? Michael Hahn, I find, was elected Governor of the State of Louisiana. I find here a proclamation signed by that individual as Governor on the 16th day of March. He was inaugurated, I think, early in March, perhaps on the 4th day of March. General Banks, in his first order, from which I have read, ordered a convention to form a constitution. After Hahn was elected Governor, and after he was inaugurated as Governor, one might suppose, if the military were not interfering, that then Major General Banks would allow the civil functionary to exercise the functions of issuing proclamations to the people upon subjects purely civil. We find here that General Banks makes a proclamation on the 11th day of March, in which he clearly and distinctly states how many delegates to that convention shall come from each parish in Louisiana, and he prescribes the qualification of the voters. Then we find on the 16th day of that month Governor Hahn also issues a proclamation. Here we find that this major general, even after what he calls a civil government is elected and inaugurated, goes on proclaiming to the people of Louisiana what they shall do in a civil capacity, just as he did before the election of Governor Hahn. So it is very clear that from the beginning to the end the civil authorities were controlled by the military.

How many votes were cast when the delegates to form the constitution were elected? Only 6,184. The constitution was submitted to the people of Louisiana for their ratification, and 6,836 votes were cast for it, 1,566 against it. A constitution formed by the coercion of the military power for the free people of Louisiana was ratified by only 6,836 voters in the State! Will any Senator tell me that a constitution ratified by only that number of voters was made by the free will of the people of Louisiana? Certainly it was not. I find in a document published by the House of Representatives in an election case from Louisiana, some meager account of the number of votes cast in some of those parishes that elected delegates to the constitutional convention. General Banks ordered the election of those delegates without authority, as everybody must know, in violation of the constitution of Louisiana, as we all know. Let me read a little from this document, published by the House of Representatives:

"This convention was composed of ninety-five delegates, of which number the parish of Orleans was represented by sixty-three, leaving to the country parishes the residue of thirty-two. The undersigned have no definite information of the number of votes polled in each parish, either at the election of delegates or on the question of ratification, nor the number cast for the constitution, nor, if any, against it, but they are enabled to furnish some indication of the vote outside of New Orleans by the sparse returns which they gather from the journal of the convention.

"It appears that the parish of Ascension, within our lines, and neighboring to New Orleans, and which in 1860 had a white population of 3,940, elected her delegates by 61 votes; that Plaquemine, with a white population in 1860 of 2,529, cast 246; and in the parish of Madison, the witness Montague was elected by a vote of 28.

"It is admitted that elections were held only in the parishes included within our lines, and that these lines were the Tchèche on the one side and the Amites on the other, comprehending the parish or city of Orleans, and the neighboring parishes on the Mississippi. To a question propounded to General Banks as to what portion of the State voted, his reply was:

"All as far up as Point Coupee, and there were some men from the Red river who voted at Vidalia."

"And in his statement he announces that 'The city of New Orleans is really the State of Louisiana.'"

"In 1860 there were 357,629 whites in the State, of whom 149,063, or much less than one half, were in New Orleans, so that in no legitimate sense can it be said that it constitutes the State. It is incredible that there are not many loyal men, the test of loyalty being the willingness to take an oath of allegiance, who were entitled to suffrage upon the question of the formation of their government; but who, from the control of the public enemy, had no opportunity to vote. But assume the statement to be true, it is in evidence that there are not less than 13,000 registered and qualified voters in the city of New Orleans alone who have taken the oath prescribed by the proclamation of the President, and the vote cast at the ratification and the election for members of Congress demonstrates that not more than one half the number of those entitled to vote in that city voted at that election, to say nothing of the residue of the State."

Those are certainly very meager votes.

Major General Banks, after he issued the order directing this election and prescribing the qualification for voters, desiring very much, I have no doubt, as he had won no honors in the field—disgrace, disaster, and defeat having attended our arms wherever he faced the rebels in arms—to win some reputation by bringing this State back into the Union, was determined, as he had assured the President in letters that the people of Louisiana desired to form this government, to bring it back upon the President's one tenth principle. He issued his proclamation prescribing the qualifications of voters, altering the constitution of the State of Louisiana, and fixing the 22d day of February for the election. He seemed to have some little misgiving that the people would not distinctly understand that the military power desired them to do the work, and thereupon this major general issued another proclamation to the free voters of Louisiana. I regret that I have not that proclamation. And right here allow me to state that when General Banks made his statement before the Judiciary Committee, which he did with a great flourish of trumpets, and seemed to be animated with that kind of zeal which would entitle him to be called, in the language of lawyers, "a swift witness," he was requested to lay before us all his proclamations and orders on this subject; but, sir, the order to which I now refer was never presented to us. I had a resolution passed by the Senate the other day asking the President to send it to us. That resolution has not been answered. But, sir, I remember having read the order soon after it was issued, and in this report, made by a committee in the House of Representatives in a Louisiana election case, I find an extract from that order, which was issued a little before the election. Senators, mark you what this man says to these people, and then say if he ought not to blush for very shame when he said the military did not interfere with the election:

"Those who have exercised or are entitled to the rights of citizens of the United States will be required to participate in the measures necessary for the reestablishment of civil government." "It is therefore a solemn duty resting upon all persons to assist in the earliest possible restoration of civil government. Let them participate in the measures suggested for this purpose. Opinion is free and candidates are numerous. Open hostility cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as crime, and faction as treason."

After he had issued his proclamation altering the constitution, prescribing the qualification of voters, and ordering them to elect a Governor and other State officers, a few days before the election he issues an order in which he tells them they shall participate in that election, and that indifference is criminal. And yet the man who issued that order on the eve of that election had the audacious impudence to write and have it printed, and laid before the Judiciary Committee, that perhaps no election in any State in the Union was so little interfered with by the governmental authorities as this in Louisiana. I am astonished that Major General Banks should have made that statement. No wonder, after making that statement, that he never brought to our view that odious order in which he threatens these people with punishment if they do not come up and vote; for that is the plain English of it. He says:

"Those who have exercised the privilege, or are entitled to the rights of citizens of the United States will be required to participate in the election."

And then he goes on to tell them:

"Opinion is free and candidates are numerous. Open hostility cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as crime."

He tells them that opinion is free and candidates are numerous, but if they are so indifferent as not to go to the polls it will be treated as a crime. Talk to me of freedom of election under such military orders! Why, sir, there was but one free man, in my opinion, in all Louisiana at that time, and that was Major General Banks; and I do not know that he was free, for he was serving his master at the White House. But he was certainly the only free man there; for in one of the proclamations to which I have referred he tells them that the fundamental law is martial law. What is martial law? It is the will of the commander-in-chief. That, as General Banks tells you, was the fundamental law of Louisiana, and the word of General Banks then was the law, and not the constitution or the statutes of the State of Louisiana. No, Senators, there was no freedom of election there. When I take into consideration these documents, these proclamations and orders, and the whole history of the matter as I have produced it from the records, I am astonished that any gentleman should say there was any freedom of election there. The elections were carried at the point of the bayonet. Why, sir, when General Banks tells these people if they do not go and vote he will regard them as criminals, how much freedom do you think there is there; when he tells them in one of his proclamations, I, Major General Banks, declare that martial law is the fundamental law of Louisiana? Martial law is no law at all, but the will of the commander-in-chief, and under that fundamental law he could have beheaded them had they refused to vote. The declaration that martial law was the fundamental law was an odious and unconstitutional assumption. And yet this man tells you the election was fair and free, and Senators here tell me that this is the kind of government we should recognize in this Chamber as the legitimate State government of Louisiana. For one, sir, I will never recognize any government formed in the mode that this was as a government for one of the States of this Union—never.

It was my purpose, Mr. President, to be very brief, and merely to present in a very plain manner the official records to show that this government was not made by the people of Louisiana on their own volition, that they did not form it unawed and uninfluenced by the military power, but that the coercive finger of the military was in it from the beginning to the end. I will now notice for a few moments the statement made by Major General Banks. I know it has been a subject of comment here before. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Doolittle] the other day, alluding to this case incidentally, read from this paper. I desire to review some portions of it very briefly, and I think the Senate will see that this witness is wholly unworthy of confidence when he testifies concerning this matter, and is utterly mistaken in what he says. Let me read a few brief extracts from it, and see how they compare with what I have read. Here is a most remarkable statement:

"I desire to state, in the most unqualified terms, that no effort whatever was made on the part of the military authorities to influence the citizens of the State either in the selection of candidates or in the election of officers, and that the direct influence of the Government of the United States was less in Louisiana than in the election probably of any other State of the Union, and that the officers representing the Government, both civil and military, were divided so far as they entertained or expressed opinion upon the question of candidates, and upon the policy pursued in the organization of the government."

Now, after the proclamations I have read prescribing the qualification of voters, overturning the constitution of Louisiana in many respects, and after hearing the extract of an order of General Banks issued immediately preceding the election, in which he declares that those persons who are indifferent will be treated as criminals, and that they must coöperate in this election, will any Senator tell me how Major General Banks could have made that statement? Senators, it is wholly irreconcilable with the facts. Major General Banks was utterly and wholly mistaken when he made that statement.

It is said that all the loyal people of Louisiana within the Union lines had the privilege of voting; such is not the fact. Under the President's and Major General Banks's proclamations none could vote. None, says Major General Banks, did vote except such as had taken the oath prescribed in the President's proclamation. The loyal men of Louisiana, those who had maintained and acknowledged the old Union from the beginning, unless they would submit to the humiliating condition of swearing that they would abide and support the proclamations of the President heretofore made and those hereafter to be issued upon the subject of slavery—there are a large class of loyal men in Louisiana who refuse to take this oath—all such were excluded from voting under the military rule of Louisiana, and I have no doubt but that a large number of true Union men in Louisiana were excluded from voting by the illegal and unconstitutional orders of Major General Banks.

It is also said that the Government proposed to be recognized as the legitimate government of Louisiana is favored by all the loyal men of that State. Such is not the fact; we had before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate an earnest protest, signed by Thomas J. Durant and thirty-one others, influential Union men of Louisiana against the admission of Senators and Representatives from the State of Louisiana, and against the electoral vote of that State being counted.

I cannot conceive how those, who a few days ago voted for the resolution which provided that the electoral vote of Louisiana should not be counted, can consistently vote for the resolution under consideration. The resolution before the Senate recognizes the government formed by the convention that assembled on the 6th of April, 1864, as the legitimate government of Louisiana. The same authority that elected the Senators who ask admission here elected the presidential electors whose votes were excluded by the joint resolution passed during this session of Congress. If the Senators are admitted, the electoral vote of Louisiana should have been counted.

I have hastily, Mr. President, reviewed the official records in this matter, and that was what I proposed to do, for I intended to be very brief in what I had to say. The sole object I had in view when I rose to address the Senate was to show, not from any outside testimony, but from the proclamations of the President, from the proclamations and orders of General Banks, and from the records before us, that this government was not formed by the free will of the people of Louisiana, that not one tenth of the voters even voted for the ratification of this constitution, but that it was a government formed by coercion, under the influence of the military authorities there.

After this convention had been in session several weeks, Major General Banks made them a visit, was received with an address, and graciously told the convention that he was pleased with what they had done so far. The power and influence of the military authorities are seen in this movement from the beginning to the end of the work. Major General Banks is here urging with great assiduity and zeal the ratification of his actings and doings in Louisiana. He is here, as he was in Louisiana, the most prominent actor; he has been before the committees of the two Houses, urging with hot zeal the ratification of his work. I hope and trust that he will not find the Senate and House of Representatives as obedient to his will as he found less than one tenth of the down-trodden people of Louisiana.

Now, sir, I am of the opinion that a government formed in that way will be of no service to the people of Louisiana or to the Union; I believe it will be absolutely detrimental and injurious. If the people of Louisiana are prepared to return to their allegiance to the United States, there certainly will be enough of them there unawed and uninfluenced by military power to reorganize their State government; but if at the point of the bayonet you force and coerce a small and insignificant minority to do it, you will inflict great injury on the people of that State. You should wait until enough of them see their way and have sufficient numbers at least to make a respectable show in the community, and you should then let them proceed of their own volition to form their State government, and then it will be a matter of service to the State and of glory and honor to the Union. But if you allow one tenth or perhaps one twentieth of the people, and that one tenth or that one twentieth influenced at the point of the bayonet, to form a government, do you not know it will breed dissatisfaction, discontent, and heart-burnings, among all the other people? That will be the necessary result; there will be no harmonious action in their State affairs; it will be a matter of eternal turmoil and vexation, and why? Because you depart from every principle that should govern a free people in the formation of their government; you take it out of their hands and put it in the hands of others, of the few not animated of their own volition by a desire to return to the Union, and to form a State government for that purpose, but being driven by coercion and by threat. You see at once the interminable confusion and hatred and heart-burnings which will exist there among those people when the few are allowed to govern by military force the majority.

I for one cannot consent to admit the representatives of any State upon this floor who come here with the taint of military coercion upon them. No, sir, they must pass through the ordeal of reorganization and send representation here as the three Hebrew children passed through the fiery furnace seven times heated without the smell of fire upon their garments; they must not have the smell of military force upon their skirts; if they have, I for one will be for rejecting them, but I will rejoice when the day shall come when the people of Louisiana, when the people of Arkansas, or when the people of any other State that has attempted to go out of the Union shall lay down their arms and of their own volition reorganize their State government and send representatives to this floor and to the other end of the Capitol. It will be a glorious and a proud day when they shall do it; but until they do it unawed and uninfluenced by military power, I for one will never consent to receive their representatives here. It must be a matter of their own volition and they must not be coerced by Major General Banks or any other major general whatever.

Mr. HOWARD obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask my colleague to give way that I may move to take up House bill No. 307, so that my colleague may speak to-morrow morning.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that will not be done. If the Senator from Michigan is not prepared to go on to-night probably there may be others in the Senate who desire to say something on this subject. I think we had better progress with it. It is early in the evening and if the Senator from Michigan, who has taken the floor, is not prepared to go on, let him give way and let some one who is prepared to proceed go on to-night.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for a vote on my motion, and I hope it will prevail. I think we can get a vote on that bill to-night, and then give my colleague an opportunity to be heard in the morning at one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I like the expression that fell from the Senator from Illinois. He thought that we could progress, I think he said, with the resolution that he had in charge. There is another measure that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] has in charge that I think the Senate can progress with also, and to much more advantage. The measure that the Senator from Michigan has in charge is a reality. The measure that the Senator from Illinois has in charge is a shadow.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, with the permission of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I express my happiest gratitude to him when he says the measure of the Senator from Illinois is a shadow. I agree with him.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course it is but a shadow, and I am astonished that the Senator from Illinois can seek to occupy the time of the Senate and the country at this moment with a shadow, and set up such a shadow against the reality which my friend from Michigan is seeking to press upon the attention of the Senate. I am glad the Senator from Michigan has made his motion. I hope he will press it to a vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I hardly know whether the Senator from Massachusetts is in earnest or in jest. The honorable Senator from Illinois sits about midway between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Kentucky; he sits between the upper and the nether millstone of this opposition to the free State of Louisiana, a State which my friend from Massachusetts, as well as the Senator from Kentucky, will find the people of these United States will not regard as a shadow. They are in earnest, and the admission of the free State of Louisiana and its recognition is a thing they will demand as an earnest reality. And, sir, it is not for the Senator from Massachusetts, with all his boastful friendship for freedom and free States, to join hands with the Senator from Kentucky and undertake to prevent the recognition of the free State of Louisiana. And then he says this affair over here in New Jersey, this affair of undertaking by act of Congress to change the charter of the corporations of New Jersey, is a grand operation.

Mr. SUMNER. That is your language, and not mine.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is the substance of what the Senator said, by way of contrast, between the admission of that State which sits at the mouth of the Mississippi river and controls the outlet of that great river that binds this Union together now and forever—that free State in which a large majority of its free and loyal inhabitants have voted for this constitution, and have organized again and seek to be admitted and recognized—that State, too, whose vote is necessary (and the Senator will so find it in the end) to the adoption of the great measure of this Congress, the constitutional amendment, that is to secure freedom to the whole land—the recognition of that free State of Louisiana whose constitution knocks off the shackles from ninety thousand slaves that the emancipation proclamation did not reach—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair must remind Senators that discussion on the merits of the bill is not in order. The pending question is a motion to take up.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am simply comparing shadows [laughter] with realities; and the affair over here in New Jersey—we are to come to that again! In the whole history of the Government I believe Congress has never assumed to change the charters of railroad or of canal companies which are established by the laws of the States. And now, Mr. President, I desire to say that as this Louisiana measure is in hand, we had better dispose of it. We can just as well come to a vote to-night as at any other time, and if the Senator from Michigan desires to speak we can hear him to-night, or any other Senator, and finish the question, take the sense of the Senate, and then take the sense of the Senate on the other measure.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, "and then take the sense of the Senate on the other measure," says the Senator from Wisconsin. I say, sir, take the sense of the Senate on the other measure first, and for two good reasons: the Senate commenced the consideration of the other measure first, and has proceeded further in its discussion; and for the second reason, because the other measure is a reality calculated to produce fruits of good to the country. This measure, I say, sir, is a shadow. So far as it is calculated to exercise any influence, it is to bring upon this country disaster. Sir, I do not wish to stand here as a prophet, and I will not at this moment, on this merely incidental question, be carried into discussion; but I do warn the Senator from Wisconsin, as he loves human freedom, ay, sir, as he represents a State dedicated to freedom, to hesitate before he throws his influence on the side of such a proposition, which is to open the way to an unknown future.

Sir, I am disposed to stop here, and yet there is one other remark of the Senator to which I must reply. The Senator insists constantly upon foisting his unconstitutional idea in the way of establishing emancipation throughout this country. He says the vote of Louisiana is needed. Sir, the vote of Louisiana is not needed; and when the Senator makes that assertion it is interposing an obstacle to the adoption of the constitutional amendment. Is he a friend to the constitutional amendment? Why, then, does he interpose an obstacle to it by foisting an untenable and erroneous interpretation on the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution declares that a constitutional amendment shall become to all intents and purposes a part of the Constitution when it shall be ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. "When ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States."

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, "when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States;" but if no Legislatures exist in States, is the Senator going to make that an excuse for avoiding the establishment of that constitutional amendment? Sir, I will not recognize the rebellion to that extent; I will not recognize the independence of the rebel States as the Senator from Wisconsin does. I insist, sir, that these rebel States shall not control the national Government at this moment, in this great period of our history, and thwart the establishment of human freedom throughout the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must insist that all debate of this character is out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I am done.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on postponing the joint resolution now pending, and proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DAVIS. I comprehend the question very clearly. [Laughter.] I am much obliged to the Chair for giving me the information, but I assure the able Presiding Officer of this body that I fully understood it before his explanation. I am going to make but a single remark, Mr. President. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin is discussing shadows, he says. Now, I understand that one of the greatest realities of the American system of government is that the majority rules, and that nothing less than a majority can either build up or pull down a Government. I understand that there were at the commencement of the rebellion about sixty thousand voters or upward in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will correct the honorable Senator on that subject. Fifty-one thousand was the highest vote ever polled in Louisiana.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose that an excess of actual vote of nine thousand in a State giving fifty-one thousand votes at the polls is not an unreasonable estimate, and that I may safely assume that the voting population of the State of Louisiana at the beginning of the rebellion was at least sixty thousand. Now, sir, by what majority, by what popular vote, was this magnificent government which the Senator from Wisconsin wants to bring into this Hall organized? My colleague gave the facts of the case to the Senate. There were only about nine thousand votes cast in the election when members of the convention were elected to form a new constitution. The old constitution was not superseded. When the power opposed to the existing government of a State rises, and by violence overbears it, that government is prostrate like a reed that bends to the storm; but when the storm has blown over in its fury the reed rises in its erect position. So of a constitution and a government of a State. There were over fifty thousand votes against secession in the State of Tennessee, and there never has been a day when amidst all the population of Tennessee there was not a great and controlling majority for the old constitution. It was a minority clothed with military power, when the great mass of the people were disarmed, and were at the mercy of the armed but otherwise insignificant minority, that was able to subvert and to overthrow for the time the constitution of Tennessee; and whenever the Federal Government by its armies swept that usurping minority from the State of Tennessee, the government and laws of that State arose again in all their majesty, and validity, and power, and it was only necessary for a majority of the loyal people to take possession of the government again, and to elect members to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, and the State would be back legitimately and constitutionally in the Union.

But, Mr. President, the Senator's favorite constitution was made by a small and insignificant minority of the people of Louisiana in the representation which they had in the convention that formed it, and when that constitution was submitted to the people only about six thousand voters ratified it as their system of government. It is doubtful whether it had even the requisite one tenth which the President's unauthorized proclamation assumed to allow to organize a State government. Sir, against the great universal American principle that lies at the bottom of the State governments and of the United States Government, that the majority rules, what magistrate, what imperial despot, what autocrat, what power in this land, has the right to proclaim that one tenth of the people may pull down an existing, legitimate, constitutional government, and rear upon its ruins a new government? It is only necessary to state the proposition that its monstrous absurdity, its shocking untruth, its mischievous and evil results, revolutionary, utterly violent and revolutionary, may strike every mind.

Now, Mr. President, when the honorable Senator from Wisconsin is comparing shadows, and his government is sustained by only six thousand of the people of the State of Louisiana, probably less than one tenth of its population, I assume that his government is the shade of a shadow.

Mr. HENDERSON. The question I believe is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to postpone the pending question and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him, and upon that question the Chair has intimated that no extended debate can be allowed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] will not persist in his motion. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] is ready to proceed on the resolution under consideration, and I understand the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is quite willing to yield his right to the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. No; we had better have the other question up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do gentlemen wish to take the floor away from the Senator from Missouri, when he is ready to go on?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; the Senator from Illinois did the same thing yesterday to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL] who had the floor on the bill which I have moved to take up. I am ready to reciprocate all favors of that kind.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Senate will not agree to the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, if he persists in taking the floor from a Senator who is prepared and ready to proceed with the discussion of the subject before the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say that I do not wish to occupy much of the time of the Senate. In fact, I think the Senate is not in a condition now to listen to a very extended discussion upon any subject. I have been engaged in committee very arduously for a long period, and I have had very little time to devote to the consideration of the question before the Senate, but I feel considerably interested in it. My State, and so does your State, sir, [Mr. POMEROY in the chair] occupies a position that demands, at our hands, as early a restoration to the Union of the States lying on the Mississippi river as we can possibly secure, and this is too important a matter to be treated as it has been treated here this evening.

Mr. President, are we going to restore the Union or not? It is needless for us to speak of the oppressions and the wrongs of military men in the seceded States. We must get those States back into the Union in some way, and the sooner we go about it the better, provided we can do it without violating the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and without overturning the republican system upon which all our institutions are founded. If these States are here in such a condition, if they have been brought here with such system and with such order that without a violation of the principles of the Constitution we can admit them, we ought to do it. Sir, this Union will never be restored except through the agency of State governments in the seceded States. It is an utter impossibility to do it otherwise. I shudder as much as any gentleman at what is called military oppression, but I desire to impress it upon Senators that it is important to consider the manner in which these States are ultimately to be returned to the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether this debate is in accordance with the rules of the Senate upon the order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has suggested that it is not strictly in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator's pardon; I understood him to have withdrawn his motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg pardon; I will not violate the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I trust my colleague will give way and let us have a vote on the motion of the Senator from Michigan and vote it down.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. While I am on the floor I will make a statement that is legitimate and proper, and it is that it is important to consider this subject now. We ought to vote on it one way or the other. Let us determine it. Let us either recognize the State government or declare that a State cannot be brought back to the Union with the recognition of Congress in any such way as this. Let us have some understanding on the subject, because, if I am not much mistaken, this rebellion totters to its fall, and these States must be returned to the Union or kept in military subjection during the next twelve months. We shall adjourn in the course of a few days, and the States ought to know and the people of the seceded States ought to know how we intend to treat them. The loyal men in the seceded States ought to understand distinctly whether we are to govern them by military control, or whether we are going to permit them to establish organized governments and send members again to Congress. It is an important question. I voted the other day, in regard to the electoral vote, with gentlemen who are now opposing the recognition of these State governments. I did not think it was right that we should admit those votes to affect the presidential election; but I do hold now that, provided these State governments have been established in accordance with the principles of our Government, we should admit their representatives in this body and in the lower House. That is the question to be considered, and I hope we shall determine it while it is before us. As the representative of a State lying upon the Mississippi, I feel a deep interest in having these State governments reorganized as soon as possible. I would not insist that they should be reorganized unless it could be done in perfect consonance with our system of Government.

Now, sir, I hope that we shall not postpone the question, but that we shall keep it before the Senate and come to a vote on it to-morrow. When it is regularly before us, I shall have a few remarks to make, and I promise not to detain the Senate more than twenty minutes.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wade—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowell, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—25.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harris, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomerooy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I stated that I would not occupy much of the time of the Senate. I feel some interest in this question. I am not willing, however, to discuss the facts of the case. I shall devote no time whatever to the facts connected with the reorganization of the State government of Louisiana, or that of Arkansas. I leave them to others who know them better. The only thing I shall endeavor to do is to show that according to the principles of our Government we may very properly admit the members from Louisiana and Arkansas upon this floor; and if I can succeed in that, I shall be satisfied. I say that it is a matter entirely for the Senate to decide, whether it will admit the Senators elected from the State of Louisiana, and also for the House of Representatives to decide whether it will admit on its floor the Representatives elected, each body acting without consulting the other. That is the proposition that I lay down. I do not want to make a speech, but I desire to submit a short argument on that subject, and if Senators will give me their attention I shall soon get through. I approach the real question before us at once.

What are we aiming to do? If I understand our purpose it is to restore the Union. We find eleven States without representation in Congress. We want them again represented in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. We find in those States officials exercising power who are not bound by oaths to support the Constitution of the United States. We want a set of authorities there who will take the oath and administer the Government, subject to that Constitution. We find in them officials who are prostituting the civil power of the States to the purposes of rebellion. We want officials there who will use the civil power in upholding the Union. Until we accomplish these things we can never restore the Union. That we cannot accomplish all of them at once and in their perfect fullness, constitutes no reason why we should not begin and accomplish them in part.

I will treat Arkansas and Louisiana as both presenting themselves here. Arkansas and Louisiana men present themselves as the representatives of loyal governments, and ask us to admit them. They show they have governments whose officials are sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, who will use the civil power of their respective States to compel obedience to the laws of the United States. They do not claim that they are yet strong enough to maintain their governments without the military aid of the nation, but with that aid they hope soon to become so. Is their condition, in this respect, different from that of Maryland, Missouri, West Virginia, and Kentucky, all of which are now represented here? Without the military arm of the nation neither Ohio, Indiana, nor Illinois could maintain its State organization against the rebel armies for sixty days. I do not mean that they would not be able to support themselves against an uprising in their own States, but against the rebel armies. We could not have maintained ourselves in the State of Missouri, though we had a large majority of the voting population and of the people of the State; and why? Because we not only had to defend ourselves against the uprising in our own State, but against the legions of Texas, Arkansas, and other States south of us.

If we would restore the Union in its constitutional integrity, when it is done, we must have State governments. If we would have State governments we must begin somewhere and at some time. It is nonsensical to talk of restoring the Union and then say that we can keep the loyal people in the southern States for all time to come under military domination. I say we must restore the Union by the reacknowledgment of State governments in the seceded States. We must declare the right in Congress to make and establish these governments for the States, or permit the President, under military law, to set them up, or we must recognize such as the loyal people may set up for themselves. If, as Mr. Madison thought, the Congress cannot make them, but can only guaranty such as may already be made and found to be republican in form, it must be left with the President, under his power as the head of the Army, or to the people of the respective States. If left entirely with the President he might by military force impose upon the State a constitution against the wishes of both loyal and disloyal. In such case I frankly admit that neither branch of Congress would be under any obligation to admit representatives from such State.

But if the people—the loyal masses, whether a majority or a minority of the whole voting population as formerly known—participated in its creation and acquiesce in the revival of the State government, the case though inaugurated by the President in my judgment would be very different. According to the theory of our Government, and its practice in all its past time in analogous cases, it would seem that whether Congress or the President inaugurated the proceeding, the Constitution can only receive its validity and authority from the approval or acquiescence of the people to be affected; and that brings me to consider how the people in the seceded States shall revive their governments, and who are the legally qualified voters for that purpose in these States.

At the threshold of the inquiry we are met with the objection that the States are now without officers of any kind legally elected, and that of themselves they are powerless to inaugurate any movement to set up a loyal government. It is said they have no officials to superintend the election, to count the votes, and grant certificates of election. However desirable these formalities may be, it has not been the uniform practice of Congress to require them. In the case of California, one of the most loyal and prosperous of our States, the first election was called by the military order of a subordinate officer of the Army, a convention of delegates chosen, and a constitution framed by them and submitted to Congress. That constitution was accepted by Congress as republican in form, and under it a State government was inaugurated that for fifteen years has been administered with the greatest success. The territory had just been conquered from a foreign Power, and was wholly without civil authorities recognized by the United States. Congress had passed no enabling act, had prescribed no forms of proceeding, had done nothing to fix the qualifications of voters, had appointed no judges of election or other officers to count and certify the votes; yet the act, however informal, was ratified because the constitution on its face was unobjectionable in form, and it was believed that the people interested acquiesced in the government it established.

There is no doubt that if the old government of Rhode Island had abandoned its functions after the revolutionary party under Governor Dorr had established the new constitution and set up a government under it, Congress and the Executive, presuming an acquiescence by the people of the State in the new order of things, would have recognized Dorr's government as legitimate. Why not? The Dorr constitution was a better instrument than the old charter. If the charter was republican in form, surely the new constitution was, and if no contest had sprung up between the two governments Congress would have properly acquiesced in it as a revolution accomplished. Was it not a revolution afterward when the new constitution of Rhode Island was adopted? Was there any authority in the old charter of Charles II to call a convention in the State of Rhode Island? But after the Dorr rebellion was suppressed, according to my recollection, a new constitution was made by a convention of delegates, and there was an acquiescence in it.

Now, we are told by the Senator from Kentucky that although a majority of the legal and qualified voters of Louisiana—and I shall show before I conclude that they are only the loyal men—shall acquiesce in this constitution, we cannot admit the State. The proposition is a strange one to me.

But, sir, I will continue my argument. The State government of Missouri to-day is the offspring of a movement purely revolutionary, and almost as irregular as the proceedings of any of these States. How was it? I will state to the Senate.

The General Assembly of 1860-61 adopted an act calling a convention of delegates really to consider of secession. They did not so declare, but that was the real object. The bill of rights attached to our State constitution declares the inherent right of the people at any time to alter or amend their institutions, but no forms for the exercise of this sovereign and inherent power were prescribed. Another and altogether different mode for amending the constitution had been prescribed. But the people met and elected delegates. A large majority of the voters acquiesced in the call made by the Legislature, and participated in the election. The convention, when elected, vacated the offices held under the old State government, and proceeded to fill some of them by appointment and to provide for the election of others under an amended constitution. If these proceedings possessed any legal validity it was because of the acquiescence of the people, and not because of the act of the Legislature. The old government would not call on the United States to protect it against invasion and domestic violence, or to interpose against these revolutionary measures. The old government was disloyal, and did not want the aid of the United States. If it had asked for such aid the General Government could not have given it without lending a helping hand to its own destruction.

In the cases before us, the States are in the Union. I hold that these States are yet in the Union. If they are not in the Union you had better withdraw your armies as soon as possible, for in that case this is an unholy war. The inauguration of an effort on our part to put down the rebellion claims that these States are in the Union, and you cannot justify this war upon any other ground. We must maintain the doctrine that they are in the Union. Now, the only question is, how can you get their representatives back here? In the cases before us I assume the States are in the Union. There is but the one government in either State asking for recognition. It is admitted to be republican in form. It may be called a revolutionary government, but if the revolution be on the side of loyalty and the restoration of the Union, why should we object? The secession government was clearly revolutionary. Senators say that that revolution in the interests of treason broke the regular chain of authority and transferred the allegiance of the State to another power. If loyal governments could be thus set aside by revolutionary rebel governments why cannot the rule be reversed? We have accepted revolutionary governments in times of peace—governments springing up in the midst of anarchy, without the sanctions of regularity; why should we now reject them when they are needed to protect the loyal inhabitants of the respective States and to aid the nation in vindicating its lost authority?

Each of these governments is admitted, I believe, to be republican in form. Will any gentleman say that, on the face of these constitutions, they are not republican in form? Does the Senator from Kentucky say so? Does the Senator from Massachusetts say so? The Senator from Kentucky thinks the constitution of Louisiana is the offspring of military usurpation, but he does not say that the constitution itself is anti-republican.

Mr. SUMNER. I do.

Mr. HENDERSON. You do?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. In what particular? Mr. President, I have been in the Senate for nearly four years, and I believe now candidly that the rebellion is about at an end, and if there were no other evidence of it, that evidence would be presented to-night in the close alliance and affiliation of my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Kentucky. Truly, the lion and the lamb have laid down together.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who is the lion, and who is the lamb?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is for the gentlemen themselves to settle. [Laughter.] The Senator from Massachusetts says that these State constitutions are not republican in form. Will he tell me in what respect?

Mr. SUMNER. Because they do not follow out the principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to know in what particular. The answer is a very general one, indeed. He refuses, then, to specify. The Senator can answer more particularly hereafter, if he chooses. He says these constitutions do not follow the Constitution of the United States. I have looked over them, and I find no objection to them. I can tell the Senator that if the constitution of Massachusetts is republican in form, so are the constitutions of these two States. I do not claim that these governments are all they should be. The only question with me is, how am I best to get these States, performing their legitimate functions, in the Union again? The government established in them may be called a revolutionary government; but if the revolution be on the side of loyalty and the restoration of the Union, why should we object? The Senator from Massachusetts says the act of secession took the States out. In the name of sense cannot the act of the loyal men bring them back? If secession is potent enough to take a State out, and that was mere revolution, why cannot the loyal men perfect a revolution on the side of the Government as well as rebels perfect a revolution on the side of secession, outrage, and wrong?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator refer to me as having ever said that the act of secession took a State out?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the Senator to claim that these States are in a territorial condition; that they are not States; that by losing their State governments in the act of secession, they lose their specific identity as States.

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather the Senator should use my language than his own, when he undertakes to state my position. I have never stated that any act of secession took a State out. I have always said just the contrary. No act of secession can take a State out of this Union, but the State continues under the Constitution of the United States, subject to all its requirements and behests. The government of the State is subverted by secession; the Senator does not recognize it as legal or constitutional, I believe, any more than I do. Where, then, is the difference between us? There is no government which he or I recognize, but we do hold that the whole region, the whole territory, is under the Constitution of the United States, to be protected and governed by it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator then admits that the States are in the Union. Now, I ask him if we can restore the Union without restoring State governments in the seceded States?

Mr. SUMNER. That is the desire I have most at heart, to restore State governments in those States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I desire to ask the Senator, if the loyal men in one of those States acquiesce in the constitution presented here, are they not entitled to govern the State under it?

Mr. SUMNER. If the loyal men, white and black, recognize it, then it will be Republican in form. Unless that is done, it will not be.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if the Congress of the United States can interfere with the right of suffrage in one of the American States of this Union? I put the question to him as a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. SUMNER. I answer at once as a constitutional lawyer that at the present time, under the words of the Constitution of the United States declaring that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, it is the bounden duty of the United States by act of Congress to guaranty complete freedom to every citizen, and immunity from all oppression, and absolute equality before the law. No government that does not guaranty these things can be recognized as republican in form according to the theory of the Constitution of the United States, if the United States are called to enforce the constitutional guarantee.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senator now in all candor, as he believes the Government of the United States can thus interfere with the right of suffrage in one of the States, does he not also believe that the Congress of the United States may to-day declare that a State constitution is not republican in form because it denies the electoral franchise to women, because it prohibits intermarriage between whites and blacks, because it declares that one man shall be entitled to hold more property in the State than another? Can it so declare? The cases are analogous, and I appeal to the Senator to answer my question. If Congress has the power to regulate suffrage under the clause of the Constitution requiring the United States to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, I submit to him whether there is any limitation except the mere discretion of Congress. Let me refer on this point to James Madison, who was supposed to know something about the Constitution of the United States, but I do not know that he would be of the least authority now. [Laughter.]

The Senator admits that these two States are in the Union. If so, their constitutions were adjudged to be republican when they were admitted. A State being once in the Union, the form of its government being an adjudicated fact, no power on earth can change the constitution except the people of the State to be affected. It is to this point that I invoke the authority mentioned.

Mr. Madison, in the forty-third number of the Federalist, when asking the people of the old thirteen States to adopt the Constitution, speaking of this power, used these words:

"It may possibly be asked what need there could be of such a precaution, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments, without the concurrence of the States themselves."

Omitting the answer to the first, he says:

"To the second question it may be answered that if the General Government should interfere by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no farther than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed."

It is rather late now to present objections to the mere forms of constitution of the eleven seceded States as they stood even before the rebellion. Four of the eleven were of the original thirteen. No objection to their republicanism was presented when the Constitution was adopted, and none, I believe, has since been seriously urged. The constitutions of the remaining seven were solemnly adjudged by Congress to be republican on their admission into the Union. But Mr. Madison on this subject says further:

"As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter."

The constitutions of the original thirteen were all admitted to be republican in form, although many of them tolerated slavery, although they all prohibited the intermarriage of whites and blacks, although nearly all prohibited negroes from voting, as a large number of the northern States still do. Connecticut does not permit negroes to vote. Why not then turn the State of Connecticut out of the Union and send home our good friends who sit in this Chamber representing that glorious little State? Missouri does not allow it, and would you turn as good a man as myself out of the Senate? [Laughter.] Maryland does not allow it. Would you turn out the Senator from Maryland? New York does not allow it, nor New Jersey, nor Pennsylvania, nor Indiana, nor Illinois. Would you turn out the Senators from those States? If the doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts were carried out he would have but very few Senators left to sit with him. It would be a Union in which there would be perfect harmony, for none would be left to oppose him. Now, I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no use in sending us all home. He had better let us remain here. We may all be harmonious yet. If he can make peace with my friend from Kentucky, he can to-morrow make peace perhaps with us all.

But to return to the thread of my argument when I was interrupted.

The reception of these States is objected to because the method pursued was revolutionary. And I now repeat, why should we object when the revolution is on the side of loyalty? The secession government was clearly revolutionary. Senators say that that revolution in the interests of treason broke the regular chain of authority and transferred the allegiance of the State to another power. If loyal governments, I have already said, could be thus set aside by revolutionary rebel governments, why cannot the rule be reversed? I have already shown that in times past we have accepted revolutionary governments, and they have discharged all their duties as States. Why should we now object to mere methods of proceeding when State governments are needed by the loyal inhabitants of the seceded States for their own safety as well as to aid the nation in resuming its authority and restoring the Union as our fathers made it?

Another objection urged against the admission of States coming in this way, is, that it establishes a precedent for others to ask for and demand recognition, even with the institution of slavery, bringing back the germs of future rebellion against the Government. This objection does not properly lie in the case before us. In both of the constitutions presented, slavery is abolished. The real difficulties in the way of restoration are numerous enough. Let us not refuse to take a step in the right direction through fear that other difficulties may arise hereafter. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I am satisfied that no such apprehended difficulty can ever arise. It must long since have become apparent to every reflecting man that slavery and rebellion, by an inflexible law of events, have become synonymous. They are as Siamese twins; when one dies the other cannot long survive. It will be utterly useless, I admit, to patch up any restoration with slavery remaining. Such a restoration would be deceptive, and a peace based thereon would prove to be the most illusory of dreams.

It was a firm conviction on this subject that induced me to urge upon the country an amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the land. It was only in this way that an end could be peacefully and constitutionally attained that must in some way be reached before we could have peace. If not attained under the forms of law the people would have marched through new scenes of blood to accomplish it. The masses of the American people believe as I believe, that to retain slavery—the right to exact another's labor without reward—in any scheme of reunion would not give us permanent peace. It might temporarily smother the fires of the volcano, to burst forth after awhile with renewed violence.

In the first place, then, this fancied difficulty will be removed by the adoption of this constitutional amendment, if in no other way. Indeed, as was properly said by the Senator from Wisconsin, the admission of these very States may be necessary to settle that question in all other cases and place it beyond cavil and dispute in the future. The recognition of these governments now struggling for existence may prove to be the means through which all men will be brought to confess that slavery no longer exists in the United States. This amendment being adopted, the contests in the States over the perpetuation of slavery at once cease. No one will then claim for himself the fruits of another's labor. Instead, therefore, of opposing their acknowledgment, the friends of emancipation should insist upon their return as the best, the surest, perhaps the only lawful means of giving freedom to the entire country. Their votes are needed to carry the proposition.

But there is another reason why the opponents of slavery should anticipate no danger from this action. I have already said that in the seceded States slavery has been the shibboleth of rebellion. In the beginning many loyal men would have preserved slavery and the Union together. But the rebels have long since driven them from that position. The rebels to preserve slavery would destroy the Union. Loyal men in the South to preserve the Union have sworn to destroy slavery. They cannot otherwise maintain themselves. Both parties in the seceded States clearly understand this thing, and the issue there is more distinctly marked than it can be in the loyal States. In this connection I frankly express a sentiment which will be unpopular in the loyal States, but will meet a most hearty response in the bosoms of loyalists in the South. That sentiment is, that rather than retain the institution of slavery after the restoration of the Union, let the Union be at once dissolved, putting slavery on the one side and freedom on the other. Whatever the inconveniences to arise from such division, I do not think they would compare with the evils of renewed strife springing from an effort to reconcile such an incongruity. It would be an attempt to heal a malignant and incurable cancer, rather than lose the limb on which it had fastened. After the sufferings of this war, the public sentiment would give slavery no rest.

If, then, I am not mistaken in regard to the loyal sentiment of the South on the subject of slavery, Senators will see that it is an utter impossibility that this question can stand in the way of restoring any one of the seceded States. The rebels will not come to ask admission. It is against union with us that they have taken up arms. It is against restoration that they now use them. In that struggle they will use every material and moral force, including the slave himself, stimulated by the boon of freedom, to resist the return of their States.

The loyal men there are no less determined on their side. They know their success depends on the removal of slavery, and they will never ask Congress to recognize any but an anti-slavery government. I predict now, that whatever the future may bring in our efforts to restore peace and prosperity to our distracted country, it will fail to bring to the doors of Congress, seeking admission, a State constitution without a positive interdict of slavery. This would have been the case even without the constitutional amendment; but the adoption of that amendment is important because it removes obstacles in the pathway of loyal men in those States not yet reorganized. It settles the question forever and prevents the fierce local contests that would spring up about its existence or non-existence in the reorganization.

The chief advantage in the constitutional amendment consists in the fact that when once the supreme law it precludes forever the claim formerly set up, that any one of the States may, in its discretion, adopt slavery as an institution. It not only secures freedom in the present slave States, should the people themselves fail to abolish it, but it forever prevents the possibility of its adoption anywhere in the nation hereafter.

The chief objection, however, that I have heard urged against the recognition of these States, at least the one most earnestly urged, is that a majority of their people are in rebellion, and these constitutions reflect the will only of the loyal men, who are in the minority. It is argued that our State governments are founded on the principle that a majority of the legal voters of a State shall determine its institutions, and to permit a minority to govern is to subvert the whole republican system.

I read the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and also some remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] when a subject kindred to this was under discussion in this body. I allude to the measure excluding the electoral votes of Louisiana and Tennessee.

The Senator from Michigan said:

"For one, I am prepared to say, and I take this occasion to say it, that I shall never consciously give my vote for the readmission, directly or indirectly, of one of these rebellious States back into the Union, either by way of admitting her Senators here or in any other form, until I am perfectly satisfied, upon due evidence, that the decided majority of the voting population of such a State has become loyal to the Government of the United States, is friendly to that Government, and willing and anxious to proceed in the discharge of the functions of a State of the Union, honestly and fairly, as required by the Constitution of the United States."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] used similar language:

"In my judgment, the only sensible plan is to leave these communities until in some way we can have at least reasonable evidence to show that a majority of them are loyal, and in a condition to maintain a free republican government of their own."

That Senator even went further, and said that he would never consent to admit a State into the Union which had been reorganized in the presence of military power.

The Senator from Michigan insists that no State shall return until "the decided majority of the voting population of such State has become loyal to the Government of the United States." The Senator from Ohio thinks "the only sensible plan is to leave these communities until in some way we can have at least reasonable evidence to show that a majority are loyal, and in a condition to maintain a free republican government of their own." What does the Senator from Michigan mean by the voting population of one of the seceded States? Does he mean those authorized to vote under the constitution and laws of the State as they existed before the rebellion, or does he require a majority of the voting population as qualified under the revolutionary government? If he means the latter, the rebels may continue to change the qualifications of voters, excluding men from the polls as they become loyal, leaving only rebels to vote, and in this way we shall never get a majority. If the Senator means to refer to the voting population as qualified under the old loyal government, he thereby admits the State to be in the Union, with its old constitution and laws complete, and that a majority of its voting population, having a right to keep the State away, have also the right to bring it to Congress and demand its recognition. If this majority be obtained the Senator could not reject the State without flying in the teeth of his declaration, made in the same speech, that "we may not discard the principle that republican government, as understood on this continent, rests upon the willing assent of a majority of the people of the particular community." He had already said that in using the word "people" in this connection, he meant the "voting population," for in them rests the political power. The Senator further says, "that if we abandon this great principle, that a majority not only shall but must govern, we have thrown the leading principle upon which all our governments, State and Federal, are organized, to the winds; we have given up the great experiment of republican government."

If the Senator should insist upon this principle of government in its broadest sense, it would justify secession. If it be strictly true that a majority in a State, or, as he terms it, a "particular community," "not only shall but must govern," then a majority of legal voters in a State desiring to secede will have the undoubted right to do so. But such cannot be the Senator's meaning; for surely no principle of our Government will authorize a majority of voters, or a majority of the civil society, that is, the entire people of a State, to secede. Indeed such majority, added to a majority of the people of all the States, and a majority of the States themselves, will give no legal sanction to secession. It is not, then, true that a majority of voters in a State can govern themselves except in strict obedience to the Constitution of the United States. If that majority rebel against the United States, we cannot longer recognize it as constituting the political power of the State. If a majority of the people of a State resist the national Government, they cease to be the State, and their acts cannot be recognized in its government. But the Senator's own argument admits that a State, with boundaries fixed and powers and duties defined, yet remains. Of what, then, does the State consist? However this may be answered, its political power, at the least, must rest in the hands of its loyal voters. When we speak of a State, we mean a State in the Union, a State whose officials are willing to be sworn to support the Constitution, and who acknowledge its supremacy. If a majority prove derelict, and undertake to destroy the very Government of which the State is a part, I assert it is right that the minority, who sustain the Government in its entirety, State and national, should govern. When a majority of the people of a State pass an ordinance of secession, one of three things must be true. First, the act of secession is valid, as a rightful exercise of the republican principle; or second, the loyal minority—the majority having withdrawn their allegiance—have the right to govern according to the Constitution, and for that purpose are authorized to institute government for their protection; or third, a State having been driven by force or fraud to pass an act of secession, is outlawed, and Congress may proceed to govern it as a province for all time to come, with the hard and oppressive hand of military rule.

The second of these conclusions is that which commends itself to me; and in the case of Louisiana, the mere fact that General Banks provided a way, a means, for the loyal men of Louisiana to express their sentiments, does not invalidate their action. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that General Banks had no legal authority to do a great many things that he did, but the question here is, is this the will of the loyal men of Louisiana? If it is, their representatives have a right to seats on this floor.

The last of the three propositions I have just stated is that which is sustained by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan says he would keep them five, ten, twenty years in a state of tutelage.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose the honorable Senator from Missouri does not intend to do me any wrong in stating what I said. He should therefore have added, "if that length of time should be necessary to reproduce loyalty in a seceded State, and thus to restore them to the Union as a loyal people."

Mr. HENDERSON. I never do a Senator injustice. I have the Senator's remarks before me, and I will read what he said:

"I never will consent to admit into this Union a State, a majority of whose people are hostile and unfriendly to the Government of my country. I prefer to hold them in tutelage (for that is really the word) one year, five years, ten years, even twenty years, rather than run the risk of a repetition of this rebellion, which has cost us so much blood and treasure."

Those are the Senator's precise words as reported in the Globe of February 3. I was astounded at the proposition when he stated it. I have said, Mr. President, that we must get these State governments back. We must restore the Union in its integrity, and to do that we must not only have a national Government in its purity and power, but we must have State governments also. Unfortunately, however, the whole tendency of the legislation of Congress to-day is in the direction of destroying State governments. When we have done that we have not restored the Union of our fathers. The people of this country did not rush to arms in 1861 with the most distant idea that we should come out of this rebellion with the State governments destroyed and with a strong, consolidated, central Government. If Senators believe this Government will be stronger and better when they have thus strengthened and consolidated the powers of Congress they are sadly mistaken. Our forefathers did not think so, and I cannot now be mistaken that no single consolidated Government can so legislate as to give satisfaction and peace throughout this broad expanse, stretching from ocean to ocean, and from the Gulf to the frozen regions of the North. And when I say that State governments must yet exist if civil liberty is to exist in this country, I do not mean State governments that are mere shadows, "airy nothings," whose powers shall have been usurped by a central despotism, but those strong, vigorous, and healthy political communities that the framers of the Constitution intended they should be—governments whose authority shall be exercised fearlessly, but strictly within the limits of their reserved powers, and with a view to maintain the power and dignity of the Federal Government as a part of themselves and a participant in their own glory. I would have each State loyal to the Federal Government. I would have each citizen of the State not only loyal but sufficiently intelligent to know the meaning of loyalty. I would have the State to be composed of—"Men who their duties know,

But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain."

I fully appreciate that just indignation excited in the bosoms of loyal men against the pretense that State rights can justify secession, whatever may be the cause of grievance. No one, having a proper view of our Government, can fail to condemn the wicked and unfounded claim that the present rebellion, causeless and flagitious as it is, can find a mantle for the least of its crimes in the sacred name of State rights. The rights of the States are such as exist in the unawakened exercise of their reserved powers, and also such as the States may claim at the hands of the General Government in the wise and prudent exercise of its delegated authority.

Why, sir, gentlemen are urging the so-called New Jersey bill, and antagonizing it against the very proposition to restore the Union of our forefathers. What is that bill? There was not a statesman in the first quarter of a century of our Government, yea in the first half century, that ever claimed the power which that bill asserts. We have marched far beyond what they ever imagined, and the power now is claimed on every hand to walk into a State and tear down its institutions merely because it has seen fit in the creation of a local corporation within its own limits to impose a tax upon it in another way from that which suits us. In my own State for the franchises of corporations we levy a tax on their capital, additional to the tax levied upon property generally, and why? Because it is a privilege given not conferred on others. The State of New Jersey, instead of levying a tax upon the capital of the railroad company, simply declares that the company shall pay so much upon every pound of freight and every passenger carried on the road. She has the right so to declare. What is the difference in substance between that legislation and the legislation of my own State?

On examination it will be found that each State in the Union has invariably claimed and exercised the exclusive right to incorporate railroad companies, and in return for the franchise they have imposed burdens which must in the end fall upon those who have business with the corporation. The company, to pay the extra tax, and compete with other avocations in the profits of business, has only to levy a little more on its passengers and its freight. The moment we enter on such a system of legislation and tear down the States of this Union, that moment we have built up a consolidated Government that will end in despotism.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask the Senator if he remembers the words of George Washington when he transmitted the Constitution of the United States to Congress?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do, perfectly well.

Mr. SUMNER. In which he undertook to declare the desire which the Federal Convention had nearest its heart, to see these States consolidated into one.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; not the States consolidated into one State, but the Union consolidated. Of that sort of consolidation spoken of by General Washington I am as much in favor as the Senator from Massachusetts. I want to get rid of the rebel majorities in the seceded States to which he attaches so much importance, not because they recognize State governments, but because they refuse to recognize the authority of the national Government, to which they owe allegiance. I say that each State must govern itself, subject to the Constitution of the United States. When General Washington spoke of "the consolidation of our Union," he meant simply that the Convention had formed a national Government, and not a Government which was a mere league or confederation of States, as had been the case under the old Articles of Confederation. He meant that they had changed the nature of the Government, that they had made it a national Government, in which the laws operated on the citizens, and not on the States. Since the national Government of which General Washington spoke was adopted, when Congress levies a tax you send your collector to every citizen to collect it. Prior to that time you only notified each State of the amount due by that State, and if the amount was not paid, as was frequently the case in the revolutionary war, the Federal Government was without the means of collection. The State could stand in open defiance of Congress. If troops were needed, each State had its quota assigned; but if the State neglected or refused to furnish them, Congress could not seize, as now, the citizen under your enrollment laws. And this is what General Washington meant by the consolidation of the Union. I well remember the letter, and accord to his words all the force and all the power intended by him in the use of them.

Mr. President, do you suppose you will ever have loyalty in the southern States if you undertake to govern them by generals and provost marshals for all time to come? Do you want to put down the rebellion? I will tell you how to do it. Establish loyal governments there, a nucleus around which the loyal men can flock, and they can put the rebellion down much better than we can. They know the haunts of rebellion; they know where it is strong and where it is weak. Sir, I have lived in the midst of it; I have grown up for the last four or five years to a knowledge of its instincts and purposes, and I have learned something of the means best adapted to its overthrow. I think I know how only it can be put down. It can only be done by the agency of loyal State governments; you must let the loyal men establish governments, and Congress must protect them against "invasion and domestic violence." You must recognize these State governments and uphold them, as a duty enjoined by the Constitution. If this be done, when the rebel armies are broken, your military power will no longer be needed. Your soldiers may be discharged and your Treasury relieved. Law and order will at once resume their sway. The beautiful harmony of our political system will be restored. Each government will move in its appropriate sphere. Each will revolve in its own orbit. Peace and happiness will return because the government is restored and not overthrown. If this be not done, anarchy will reign supreme for many years hence, and outlaws and guerrillas, rejoicing in the anarchy and inefficiency of military rule, will mock your vain efforts to reestablish national authority. To secure national supremacy you must have the aid of State authority. For legitimate State authority you must rely upon the loyal voters.

Mr. SUMNER. There is where I agree precisely with the Senator, and I should like to hold him to that. He says the loyal men must form the government, and we should recognize that government; and yet he insists upon a mere oligarchy forming it, and an oligarchy of a skin.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator says he agrees with me in my position, but insists that I am in favor of an oligarchy. If I am in favor of an oligarchy, and he agrees with me, then he also wants an oligarchy. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator plays upon words.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have already explained my positions on these subjects. I am in favor of the loyal men governing the State. If that be the government of the few, it results from the voluntary disloyalty of the many. They, of their own will, relinquish the right to govern themselves under the Constitution, and as they have no legal right to govern otherwise they cannot govern at all. I can no more compel them to govern themselves according to the Constitution than I can compel a loyal man to vote who refuses to do so. As to the oligarchy of skin or color, I can tell the Senator again that the question of suffrage is with the States. If they confer the franchise on the negro, I surely do not object.

Mr. President, I say that the only way to crush out disloyalty and bring back peace in this country is to let the loyal men of the seceded States form State governments, and let us uphold them. That is the means upon which we must sooner or later rely to reestablish peace and restore Union.

Let me say a word upon this alleged right of a rebel majority to keep Union men from the enjoyment of the privileges of a State government.

A citizen of one of the States removes to Mexico, abjures allegiance to the United States, and assumes citizenship there. We have never denied the right of a citizen to expatriate himself. He has elected to transfer his allegiance to another Power. His Government consents. The tie is broken. He becomes a citizen of another Power, and the Government of the United States abandons all claim to his allegiance. After assuming the rights of citizenship under a foreign Government it is not pretended that our Government should recognize him as a citizen or extend to him the rights and privileges belonging to a citizen.

In the case of this rebellion the disloyal inhabitants of the seceded States did not expatriate themselves, it is true, for they did not leave the country, but they have voluntarily withdrawn their allegiance from this Government and transferred it to a de facto government of their own making. So far as they can effect it, the tie that bound them to this Government is as completely severed as if they had expatriated themselves by removal and oath of allegiance to a foreign de jure Government. It is the animus, the intention of the citizen, that settles his rights and fixes the duties of the Government to him. The declaratory statement of Martin Koszta was considered sufficient by our Government to impose on it the duty of protecting him against the claims of citizenship set up by his former Government.

A few days since the Senate passed a bill denationalizing or decitizenizing, if I may use the term, all those who shall desert from our armies and those who, having deserted, fail to return in sixty days to their commands. The power to do so was not disputed. The act to punish treason and its allied offenses, of July 17, 1862, provides that the guilty parties shall not again hold office under the Government.

If it be said that Congress has not given its assent to this withdrawal of allegiance by the rebels, I answer that I am willing to express that consent now, so far as my vote can go, by admitting these two States, if they are not in already; I do not care how gentlemen consider it.

If it be said that one may be a citizen of a State and not of the United States, or a citizen of the United States and not of a State, I admit it. But if it be therefore insisted that rebels are recognized as citizens in the seceded States by their respective State governments, and that they are entitled to vote by State law, notwithstanding they are deprived of United States citizenship by Congress, I answer that the constitutions of nearly all the seceded States, at the beginning of the war, required that a voter therein should be a citizen of the United States.

I repeat, that in nearly all of the eleven seceded States United States citizenship was a necessary qualification of suffrage. The whole question of United States citizenship is under the control of Congress. If the national Government has the right to claim the allegiance of each citizen, it follows that when the citizen withdraws his allegiance and elects to alienate himself, the Government may withdraw the privileges of United States citizenship from him. The moment that is done he ceases to be a voter in any State whose constitution makes this a test of qualification.

I have already said that any change of constitution made in furtherance of rebellion is void. If the test existed at the inception of the rebellion it exists yet. Therefore the failure of the rebels to vote did no harm to the great principle of republicanism, let me tell the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SUMNER. It was the failure of loyal citizens to vote that did the damage.

Mr. HENDERSON. I answer that by asking, what loyal men did General Banks prevent from voting?

Mr. SUMNER. All the colored race.

Mr. HOWARD. I trust the Senator from Missouri does not impute to me the strange notion of allowing disloyal citizens to vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not.

Mr. HOWARD. From the remark the Senator made I supposed he had drawn such an inference.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, Mr. President, I know the Senator from Michigan too well to suppose for an instant that he would make an argument which he himself supposed for a moment would lead to such a conclusion. I am only trying to correct the impression which would be made on a disinterested listener.

Mr. HOWARD. It was not my conclusion, but the inference which the Senator seemed absurdly—I must say it—to draw from my reasoning, that troubled me.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wanted to relieve from the mind of the Senator difficulties of a constitutional character that seemed to keep him back and prevent him from voting for the recognition of these States. The conclusion would not be absurd from his argument. I only failed to draw it because of my knowledge of himself, and not because his argument does not justify it. I am aiming to get the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan, and also the Senator from Kentucky to join hands and go for it.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] insists that General Banks, in the Louisiana case particularly, fixed the qualifications of voters regardless of the State constitution, and thereby permitted many to vote who were not rightfully entitled. I will agree with him that such is the fact. I will not justify General Banks in that, but that fact of itself does not in my judgment vitiate the constitution. The more important inquiry is, did he exclude from the polls any who were entitled to vote? If he did so, the constitution may not be the will of the loyal people of that State. We might at least be left in doubt. But the mere admission to the ballot-box of a few loyal men, not entitled to vote, should not deprive the State of representation here; if we believe the constitution, as presented, embodies the will of those legally entitled to exercise the functions of the State government. If the casting of illegal votes vitiated elections but few elections would be valid.

A strong argument in favor of admitting these States consists in the fact that when admitted they can at once settle all questions of suffrage for themselves, and Congress will be relieved of the difficulty in the future. In this very case the Senator from Kentucky objects to the constitution because negroes bearing arms were permitted to vote. The Senator from Massachusetts objects because the negroes at home did not vote. But the exclusion of so many persons formerly entitled to vote materially decreases the voting population in each of the seceded States. As it is decreased persons are too apt to conclude that its representation in Congress should in the same proportion be diminished. It should be remembered that representation among the States is not to be apportioned according to their voting population, but upon their entire numbers, including all free persons, and apprentices bound for a term of years, white and black, male and female, whether citizen or inhabitant, and three fifths of all other persons, except Indians not taxed, who are entirely excluded. Under the Constitution it is no concern of ours how many or how few men can vote for State officers. Indeed the General Government in recognizing the old State government of Rhode Island against the Dorr party gave preference to a constitution of restricted suffrage. Our business is to ascertain the number of people, as before stated, and thereupon to apportion representation. If those persons disqualified to vote still remain in the State I see no way to exclude them from the estimate. If they have left the State I can see no reason why Congress may not at any time, even before 1870, cause an enumeration to be made upon which representation may be readjusted.

Mr. President, on this subject I will take the privilege of reading the views of one of the ablest jurists of this country, which were furnished to me at my solicitation in a private letter now before me. Though not intended to be used here, I am satisfied he will excuse the liberty taken if it will remove the least obstacle in the way of a nearly restoration. He says:

"Here it must be observed that the civil society, and the political society so to speak, of a State need not necessarily do the same. In other words the basis of representation may be the whole population, but the basis of suffrage be property, adult years, &c. The power to choose rulers is lodged in the voters, and they may not exceed one tenth of the population. Under our complex system, each State has its quota of representation in the United States House of Representatives, according to its prescribed population, and in the Electoral College, according to such population, with two added, irrespective of population, corresponding to the Senators. It is left to the Legislatures of the States, respectively, to prescribe the manner of choosing presidential electors, and all except South Carolina choose by popular suffrage. The political society, so to speak, or that portion of the population in which political power is lodged, determines who shall fill the respective offices, make laws, &c. Although the members of that society may have possessed every requisite therefor, yet the moment they ceased to be citizens of the United States they ceased to belong thereto.

"That rule holds good with respect to every member, and the political society may, by death, disqualification of members, &c., be reduced to a very few persons. To state an extreme case, for illustration of the principle, Massachusetts formerly had a property qualification, and although her population entitled her to, say, thirteen Representatives in the United States House, her voters may not have exceeded fifty thousand. Suppose while that qualification remained, by some financial or other disaster, only one thousand or one hundred citizens retained the necessary income or property, would not the persons chosen to Congress by the few and only remaining voters be duly elected? So with regard to any other element of suffrage, as United States citizenship, if by its loss the voters are reduced to very few in number, do not those few constitute the political or voting power? As to the policy or impolicy of restricted suffrage, we are not now concerned, but are endeavoring to reach a constitutional and legal analysis of our governmental system.

But here is encountered the startling and practical difficulty, 'Shall a few persons be permitted to govern a State, despite the wishes of its inhabitants, and without giving them all a voice? Is that republican?'

"But it must be remembered that the few voters, say one seventh, or one tenth of the whole population, have always been intrusted with that power. Wisdom has fixed the basis of suffrage, without regard to relative numbers; that is, it has endeavored, under our popular system, to give the right or privilege to as many citizens as were supposed competent to exercise it intelligently. The rules prescribed as to age, sex, citizenship, &c., were deemed essential, right, and proper. Whether many or few come within the rules does not affect their validity. Although the women, children, and unnaturalized persons in a State might outnumber the voters twenty to one, or fifty to one, yet it would not be considered wise, or compatible with the success of a free Government that its destinies should be intrusted to those owing it no allegiance, or unfit to administer its affairs. Theoretically, there is no difficulty here. If persons heretofore entitled to a vote chose to commit a felony, and incur thereby, as a penalty, the deprivation of their former right of suffrage, it is not supposed that the loss of such votes is anti-republican. If, then, a majority chose to perpetrate treason, or to expatriate themselves, or in any other way become disqualified, how does that action vitiate the rule? If they, after becoming disqualified, remain in the State, are they not bound to submit to its rulers and laws? If their rulers are chosen without their voice, is it not in consequence of their own voluntary action? Indeed, it often happens that the persons elected to office receive only a meager minority of the votes which could have been lawfully polled, yet that fact has no influence upon the legal result. So a person is often chosen by a minority of the votes actually cast, and is not the majority bound to submit?

"The rightfulness of an election, and the right of suffrage, depend not on the relation of numbers in a State. Political power is lodged where it is deemed wisest, safest, and best for all. Still it must be admitted that according to our wishes and popular expectation a very few persons ought not to be permitted to outweigh the many. Although Tennessee, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, or South Carolina, may choose to lodge the power to vote in a few hands, the question is solely an internal one for those States respectively. The weight of each State in the Electoral College or in the United States House of Representatives does not depend on the number of voters in such State, but on its representative population; and consequently the other States are not injured or lessened in power or influence, whether such State adopts property or other restrictions, or whether its mere voters are few or many. Such is our constitutional system."

Now, Mr. President, at this late hour I will not detain the Senate longer. There are many other questions connected with this subject that I would consider if time permitted. But I content myself at present with laying down the following propositions as true, and if true the States should be admitted. If untrue, I desire to know in what what particular and why they are untrue.

1. I hold that the seceded States are still in the Union and cannot get out of it except through an amendment of the Constitution permitting it.

2. The seceded States being still in the Union are entitled to claim all the rights accorded to other States.

3. That each State now in the Union has the right to stand upon the form of its constitution as it existed at the time of its admission. The people of such State may change its constitution, provided they retain a republican form of government; but neither the President nor Congress can reform, alter, or amend such constitution, nor prescribe any alteration or amendment as a condition of association with the other States of the Union. The General Government may properly lend its aid to enable the people to express their will; but any attempt to exercise power constitutionally reserved to the State, beyond what may be demanded by the immediate exigencies of war, will not tend to restore the Union, but rather to destroy our whole system of government.

4. When citizens of a State rebel and take up arms against the General Government they lose their rights as citizens of the United States, and they necessarily forfeit those rights and franchises in their respective States which depend on United States citizenship.

5. If a seceded State be still in the Union, entitled to recognition as a State, and a majority of the people have voluntarily withdrawn their allegiance, the loyal minority constitute the State and should govern it.

6. Congress should not reject the governments proceeding because of mere irregularity in the proceedings leading to their reorganization.

7. If Congress has no right to make and impose a constitution upon the people of any State; if its power extends no further than to guaranty preëxisting republican forms of government; if the State still exists, and the loyal men are entitled to exercise the functions of its government, it follows that the only questions to be examined here are, first, is the constitution the will of the loyal men qualified to act? and, second, is it republican in form?

8. The constitutions of Louisiana and Arkansas are thought to be republican in form, and it is admitted that the loyal men of those States respectively acquiesce in them. Hence the duty of Congress to recognize them, and the duty of each House to admit their representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THRUSH, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to have put upon its passage House bill No. 746, being "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to encourage immigration, approved July 4, 1864,' and the act entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, approved March 3, 1855,' and for other purposes."

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

CONDITION OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 89, directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes, and their treatment by the civil and military authorities.

No objection was made.

The joint resolution was then taken up and read a first and second time.

It provides for the appointment of a joint committee, consisting of three members of the Senate, and four members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the presiding officers of the respective bodies, to inquire into the present condition of the Indian tribes, and especially into the manner in which they are treated by the civil and military authorities of the United States, with power to sit during the recess of Congress, and send for persons and papers, employ a clerk, &c., and report at the next session of Congress such legislation as may be necessary for the better administration of Indian affairs, and appropriating $15,000 for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I heard correctly the joint resolution as it was read, I think there ought to be an amendment to it. I approve entirely of the general scope of this joint resolution; but I am not certain but it needs some amendment to make it more perfect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the House has already raised a committee of its own members for this purpose, but the Senate prefer a joint committee for this purpose.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I propose to amend the joint resolution so as to provide for four members on the part of the Senate and five members on the part of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the joint resolution now says "four members of the present House." I think it should have the following words inserted, "who shall be members-elect to the next Congress."

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I have no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to gentlemen the query whether we can sit in this manner after we are dead. It looks to me like an unusual thing.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to increase the committee on the part of the Senate to four members, and on the part of the House to five members.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to say that I think the proposition embraces members of a commission; and while upon the floor, I desire to say that my connection with the Committee on Indian Affairs has satisfied me fully of the necessity of some measure of this sort being taken by the Government and the country, in order that the next Congress may know the condition of the various Indian tribes upon our frontier. The debate that sprang up here last night upon the Indian appropriation bill evinced a great want of knowledge on the part of members of this House of the condition of the Indian tribes on our frontiers, and I know of no better way than this to get correct information upon that subject; not only as to their particular condition, the number of tribes, their particular locations, but also to ascertain the further fact as to what is necessary to be done by the Government to maintain peace, protect the inhabitants of our frontiers, and promote not only the interests of our own people in the new Territories and new States, but to promote the welfare and interest of the Indian tribes. It strikes me that in reference to this question of dealing with the Indian tribes of this country no measure of so much importance to them and to us has been introduced into this Congress or into any former House. I hope, therefore, that this joint resolution will be passed by the House; but I do not see the necessity for raising so large a committee as is proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I propose this amendment in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. WINDOM,] and at his request. We are now approaching the close of the session, and unless this proposition be acted upon promptly, undoubtedly it cannot pass both Houses at this session. For this reason I have called up the resolution for action this morning. If there are serious objections to increasing the number of the committee I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I have no serious objection to the amendment; but it struck me that the number proposed by the Senate was sufficient.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I call for the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Will the gentleman withdraw that call for a moment, that I may make a single remark?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I desire simply to say that I think one person appointed for this purpose by the President of the United States, by and with the advice of the Senate, would be able to accomplish all that a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress would accomplish.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all after the words "consist of" to the word "Representatives" inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "one person, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to have this joint resolution again read. I admit the right of Congress to create a commission for the purpose of making this examination; but I do not admit the right of this Congress, now about to expire, to appoint a committee whose power shall continue during the recess. If this proposition be put into such a shape as to provide for the creation of a commission, I shall have no objection to it; but I do object to appointing members of this House as such.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I think the legal effect of the resolution will be the creation of a commission.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa whether it is not better to let this matter go over until to-morrow so that a bill providing for the appointment of a commission can be prepared. This Congress being about to expire, I think it is not competent for this House and the Senate to appoint a committee as a committee. I am very willing to join in the creation of a commission to be properly appointed for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] can move to amend this joint resolution so as to provide for a commission instead of a joint committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I was about to make that suggestion to the gentleman. He can accomplish his purpose in that way.

Mr. STEVENS. But then the Speaker, as I understand, is to be the appointing power.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I am not willing to consent to a postponement of this matter until to-morrow, because the delay may preclude any action on the subject at this session of Congress. I desire action upon the resolution this morning, in order that we may amend it, and that our amendments may be concurred in by the Senate.

I demand the previous question upon my amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move that the bill, with the pending amendments, be laid on the table.

On the motion there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 46; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers. Mr. PRUYN. Before tellers are ordered, I would suggest that this matter be allowed to go over until to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal. That, I think, will meet the objections of gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent that this matter shall go over until to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I object.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, and Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I withdraw the call for a division.

The motion to lay the bill and amendments on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask my colleague to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment, in order that I may make a suggestion.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. It is this: the Committee of Ways and Means has had a great desire to have a careful report touching the best mode of deriving a revenue from the mineral resources of the country, and a commission might be constituted to embrace an inquiry into that as well as into the condition of the Indian tribes. It would be an economical measure to embrace both in one commission.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that this bill purposes to confer upon the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate the power to appoint such a commission. I suggest that this provision of the Constitution is in the way: that Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. I know of no provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to clothe the Speaker of this House and the President of the Senate with power to make the appointment of any officer created by law.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. That provision of the Constitution does not affect this question at all. The resolution does not propose the appointment of officers.

Mr. DAWES. What does it do?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. The raising of a committee to furnish to the Senate and the House of Representatives at the next session of Congress information in reference to the condition of Indian tribes upon the frontier.

Mr. DAWES. My friend cannot get around the Constitution by calling this a committee instead of an office. I take it that it does not make any difference.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do not propose to get around it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. If we refuse to second the demand for the previous question will not amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will when the pending amendments are disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL. Will it be in order to move to make it one commissioner to be appointed by the President of the United States?

The SPEAKER. That amendment is now pending.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio; and there were—ayes 24, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and make it three.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. J. C. ALLEN and MORRILL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, was then disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "of the present House" and in lieu thereof to insert "who shall be members of the next Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out that part which refers to members of the Senate and the House, and to provide that the commission shall consist of three, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that will not be done. It is proposed that this shall be a committee to inform the House at the next session in reference to legislation for the benefit of the Indians. I believe that the bill as it is will secure the object we desire better than any commission appointed by the President.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. This House will expire at twelve o'clock meridian on the next 4th of March, and no House of Representatives will meet again until the first Monday of December, unless sooner convened by the President. Therefore I think that the best method would be as I propose, by a commission.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I do not see why we cannot get this information as well by a commission as by a committee appointed by the Houses of Congress. I see an insurmountable difficulty to the appointment of a committee by this House, because this House expires on the 4th of March next, and you cannot appoint members of the next Congress, because they are not members until they are sworn in. They are not, therefore, a committee of the Congress of the United States. They become commissioners appointed by the Congress of the United States, and hold their offices by virtue of their appointment, independent of their election as members of this House or of the Senate. Then they become officers under the United States Government, the holding of which is incompatible with the office of a member of Congress. To my friends upon this side of the House I desire to say a word. I came into the Hall at the time they were dividing, and I protested at once against this proposition. Gentlemen opened their eyes and seemed to be astonished that I opposed it, because they thought it came partly from their own friends. So far as that view is concerned I would go with them; but I remember that two years ago, when by a joint resolution of Congress the committee on the conduct of the war had its existence prolonged beyond the term of office of the members thereof, which expired on the 4th of March, the Democratic party throughout the whole country raised their voice against it, and said they were unauthorized persons, and their report not legally authorized by law. I saw that these two cases were exactly parallel, and I did not see how the Congress of the United States could appoint a committee of its own body whose offices expired on the 4th of March, or of those who expected to come into office at some future time. Therefore I favor the proposition to let the authority be put into the hands of the President of the United States, to be exercised according to his judgment.

Mr. SHANNON. I said—

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I believe I have the floor. I propose to call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield the floor.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I did not.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. SHANNON. I submit that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is the proper one. It is utterly impossible for any committee appointed now to report at the first session of the next Congress. It would take a man one whole year to travel West through those mountainous regions and investigate the Indian department of the three States there. If you cut down the time the report will amount to nothing, and the whole thing will amount to a farce. If you appoint three competent and well-qualified men for the discharge of this duty, and give them time enough, you may get something tangible to act upon. But if you undertake to appoint a committee of three members of Congress and send them out, requiring them to report at the next session of Congress, I submit that the whole thing will result in a perfect farce.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. If the commission proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts shall take the place of the committee proposed by the Senate resolution, I am satisfied that the result of the investigation will be worthless. The great object of the investigation is to enable the Senate and the House of Representatives to obtain correct information; and they propose that their committee shall go and make the investigation and obtain facts upon the subject of their inquiry, and present those facts to the House and Senate in order that they may considerately and advisedly act upon the facts presented. But it is not proposed that their report shall have any binding effect. They are simply to obtain facts to be placed in possession of Congress to enable Congress to act upon them.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is not already a Department to which this Indian business is intrusted, and whose officers can give reliable information upon the subject?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman in this way: we have a Department called the Indian Department, but the gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen upon the floor of this House and of the Senate, are constantly making charges and imputations against that Department; and it is due to the Government and to the Senate, and due to the House of Representatives, that these charges should be investigated and their truth or falsity verified.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order of business, as it was taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is serious objection to this amendment making the resolution applicable to members of the next Congress, I will withdraw it. I do not want to put on any amendment which shall embarrass this proposition, as I deem it one of the most important that has come before Congress; and I hope it will be passed in some shape. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I renew it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS called for tellers upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, to amend so as to provide for three commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, instead of a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress.

Upon that question the House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 41.

Mr. COFFROTH called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 54, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, English, Garfield, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kelley, King, Knox, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pomerooy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—78.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Edgerion, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Mallory, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Pike, Price, Ross, Sloan, Smithers, John B. Steele, Siles, Strouse, Thayer, Townsend, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Arnold, Brooks, Cobb, Cravens, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Farnsworth, Frank, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Higby, Hotchkiss, Hubard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kaufleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Luzzar, Littlejohn, Loan, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoo, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Sweat, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—50.

So the amendment of Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, was adopted.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution as amended.

Upon that question, Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, called the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask permission to move to amend by striking out the words "to sit during the recess of Congress" and inserting after the words "United States," in the previous line, the words "to examine fully into the conduct of Indian agents and superintendents, and also into the management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the Department of the Interior." I desire to say merely that, after the debate here last night, I think it proper that this Bureau of Indian Affairs should be examined into. It is but just to the occupants of the bureau and to the country.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I think it is intended to kill this joint resolution by amendments. I therefore move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to offer an amendment pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust there will be no objection.

No objection being made, the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was adopted.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the joint resolution, as amended, was passed.

Mr. SHANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit court in the district of Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libels in the District of Columbia; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE and Mr. SCHENCK called for the regular order of business.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to rescind, for this morning only, so much of the order of the House which requires a morning hour for private business from committees.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The resolution for a morning hour each day is imperative, and was made by unanimous consent. It cannot be rescinded the same as a resolution for a night session, or for the time of the day's session. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] have both called for the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. It can be taken up after the morning hour. I cannot yield now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is reports of a private nature from committees. Reports are now in order from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to give way to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to call up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. It is a long bill, and if it is crowded into the last days of the session it will be utterly impossible for the engrossing clerks to properly engross the bill.

Mr. HALE. If I am allowed a morning hour after the bill is passed, then I will not object.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Is it not in order to move to dispense with the consideration of private bills for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule on that subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Friday and Saturday of every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by the House."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It seems to me that the state of the public business is such that, at this late day of the session, unless the consideration of private bills be passed over for to-day, it will be impossible to go on with the calls of the regular committees and to get in legislation that is indispensable for carrying on the Government. I therefore move that the consideration of private business be dispensed with for to-day.

The SPEAKER. A majority of the House is competent, under the rules, to adopt that motion.

Mr. HALE. I hope that the motion will not be adopted. We have given very little time during this session to the consideration of private business. There are a number of very meritorious private claims, which I hope will be considered.

I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist upon his motion. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that fifteen minutes shall be allowed for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill before proceeding to private business.

The motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 56, noes 54.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HALE], is willing that fifteen minutes shall be given to the consideration of the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill. I think that it will not take longer than that to dispose of them. I therefore ask unanimous consent that Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table and considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the amendments are read I desire to say a word in explanation of the report which has been made upon them by the Committee of Ways and Means.

All the amendments down to and including the fifteenth, are mainly mere amendments of form. The House struck out the appropriation for the building of officers' quarters, and also for the commencement of new works, but omitted to strike out some words connected with the appropriation. These words have been stricken out by the Senate. We recommend concurrence in that amendment. Among the amendments in which we recommend non-concurrence is one striking out an appropriation for the Atlantic Gulf squadron. We learn by a communication from the Navy Department that that Department deems that appropriation indispensable for the proper conduct of our naval system. It has also been ascertained that in accordance with bids received on the 1st of December it will require about eighty-eight thousand dollars more than was estimated to buy clothing for the Marine corps. In relation to the appointment of midshipmen, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The first, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, formal in their nature, were read.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendments were concurred in.

The second amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 5, lines one and two, strike out "$323,512" and insert in lieu thereof "$237,688."

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

To the third amendment of the Senate, the Committee of Ways and Means recommended an amendment, to insert in lieu of the words stricken out by the Senate the words "two building slips."

The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

To the sixth amendment of the Senate, the Committee of Ways and Means recommended an amendment, to insert in lieu of the words stricken out by the Senate the words "complete one half of storehouse."

The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Sixteenth amendment:

Strike out "$33,605," and, in lieu thereof, insert "$25,850;" so that it will read:

For preparing for publication the American Nautical Almanac, $25,850.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventeenth amendment:

Strike out the following:
To meet emergencies at the Atlantic, East and West Gulf, and Mississippi stations, $1,000,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 68.

Eighteenth amendment:

Strike out the following:

For pay of clerks in the ordnance department at the several navy-yards, in lieu of the present per diem pay, viz.:

For salary of one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200, and one at $1,000 per annum, at Boston navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at the Philadelphia navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,400, one clerk at $1,000, one draughtsman at $1,600, one analytical chemist at $2,500 per annum, one assistant pyrotechnist at $1,400, and one keeper of magazine at $480 per annum, at the Washington navy-yard, $8,380.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That one midshipman, in addition to those now allowed by law, shall be appointed for each congressional district and Territory, to be appointed on the nomination of the present members of Congress or Delegates from said districts or Territories respectively, but no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Nineteenth amendment:

Add:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to increase and regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States," approved June 1, 1860, as provided that the officer charged with experiments in gunnery at the navy-yard at Washington shall receive the sea-service pay of the grade next above him, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twentieth amendment:

Add:

And be it further enacted, That to defray the necessary expenses of the commission to select the most approved site for a navy-yard or naval station on the Mississippi river, or upon one of its tributaries, the sum of $2,590 is hereby appropriated.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PIKE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the eighteenth amendment was non-concurred in. I hope that will be done, so that we may have a vote on striking out the provision in reference to the midshipmen. I want to concur with the Senate in striking it out. There is no more room for midshipmen at Newport, although there will be when the Naval School has returned to Annapolis.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman can reach this point in the committee of conference.

Mr. PIKE. I want to have an expression of the House on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the motion to reconsider will not be agreed to. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Twenty-first amendment:

Add:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated to enlarge the accommodations for sick, wounded, &c., at the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, authorized by act of Congress of March 14, 1864.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence with an amendment to strike out "&c."

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Twenty-second amendment:

Add:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to purchase the balance of square numbered nine hundred and forty-eight, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, some fourteen thousand feet, upon which a naval hospital is now in course of erection.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence, with the following amendment:

Provided, That the same can be obtained, in the judgment of the Secretary, on terms deemed just and reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Twenty-third amendment:

Add:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the proviso of the act of March 3, 1843, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the half calendar year beginning the 1st of January, and ending the 30th of June, 1844," as requires that provisions and all materials of every name and nature for the use of the Navy be furnished by contract with the lowest bidder after advertisement, shall be and the same is hereby so far modified that it shall not apply to bunting delivered for the use of the Army and Navy, and that it shall be lawful for the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, to enter into contract for bunting as their respective services require, for a period not exceeding one year, and at a price not exceeding that at which an article of equal quality can be imported.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Add:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter in all appointments of midshipmen to the Naval Academy the selections for such appointments in the several districts shall be made from the candidates according to their respective merits and qualifications, to be determined under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall from time to time prescribe.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insist on the disagreement to the amendments of the Senate non-concurred in, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE H. CHORPENNING.

On motion by Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of an act (H. R. No. 112) for the relief of George H. Chorpennig, and the same was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

UTAH AND ARIZONA.

Mr. KINNEY, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Utah Territory on the annexation of a portion of the Territory of Arizona to Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD GRANT TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate (No. 414) making a grant of lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad in that State may be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SWEAT. I object.

Mr. HIGBY. I presume the gentleman would not object if he understood the bill. It does not appropriate any land whatever, but only extends the time, and places restrictions on the road.

Mr. SWEAT. I understand the whole subject-matter. It has been before another committee.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. ANCONA. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HALE. All my time is being taken up in this way.

Mr. ANCONA. I only desire to introduce and refer a bill.

Mr. HALE. I yield.

GEORGE W. KNOBB.

Mr. ANCONA, thereupon, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting a pension to Captain George W. Knobb; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HALE. I demand the regular order of business.

ARMISTED T. M. FILLER.

The SPEAKER announced as the business first in order the joint resolution of the House (H. R. No. 168) to refer the claim of Armisted T. M. Filler to the Court of Claims, the pending question being on its passage, upon which the previous question was moved on Friday last.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. HALE moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made a special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

HARMONY CEMETERY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER having, as the regular order of business, proceeded to call the committees for reports of a private nature,

Mr. TRACY, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Harmony Cemetery Company (of colored persons) in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TRACY moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLOMON WADSWORTH.

Mr. THAYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (No. 288) to amend an act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, to report the same back with a recommendation that it do not pass, as another bill of a similar purport has already passed Congress and become a law.

The Bill was laid on the table.

WILLIAM NICHOLLS.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Nicholls; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill, which was read, authorizes William Nicholls, of the State of Ohio, to locate warrant No. 23,727, for one hundred and sixty acres of lands, upon any of the public lands of the United States open to entry and location; and directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent to said Nicholls for the one hundred and sixty acres of land so located.

Mr. THAYER. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 751) to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Arizona and for the survey thereof.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY ROBINSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARRINGTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Mary Robinson and others, which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES COLBURN.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely the petition of Charles Colburn for back pay; which was laid on the table.

E. S. BRADY.

Mr. MOORHEAD also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of E. S. Brady for relief; which was laid on the table.

HENRIETTA O. GARDINER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief Henrietta O. Gardiner; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Henrietta O. Gardiner, widow of the late Lieutenant D. G. Farragut Gardiner, of the United States revenue service, on the pension rolls, at the rate of seventeen dollars a month, from the date of the passage of this act, to continue for and during the period of her widowhood, and in the event of her death or marriage, to be paid to her child till it shall arrive at the age of sixteen years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. ROYCE.

Mr. WHALEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution (S. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce; the question being on its third reading.

The joint resolution recites that James B. Royce, of the town of Shrewsbury, Vermont, entered the service as a private in company I, seventh Vermont volunteers, in February, 1862, and continued to serve in that company and regiment till February, 1863, when, at Fort Barancas, Florida, by the premature discharge of a cannon at which he was engaged at target practice, he received injuries that resulted in the loss of his left arm and left eye, by reason of which disability he was discharged from service in December, 1863, having served twenty-one months and twenty-two days; and that he is not entitled to the pension provided under the act approved March 3, 1863. It therefore resolves that James B. Royce is declared entitled to the benefits of that act the same as if he had been discharged for wounds received in battle, or had served the full period of his enlistment.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBECCA S. HARRISON.

Mr. WHALEY also, from the same committee, reported back with amendments, and with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the naval pension roll the name of Rebecca S. Harrison, widow of the late Lieutenant Horace N. Harrison, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, to commence 1st April, 1864, and to continue during her widowhood.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to strike out twenty-five dollars and insert seventeen dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add after the words "to continue during her widowhood" the words "and in case of her death or marriage the same to be continued to her children until the youngest shall have reached the age of sixteen years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOPHIA BROOK TAYLOR.

Mr. WHALEY, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Sophia Brook Taylor, widow of the late Major Francis Taylor; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Sophia Brook Taylor, widow of the late Major Francis Taylor, of the first United States artillery, who died of yellow fever while in command of the post at Fort Brown, Texas, in October, 1858, on the pension roll at the same rate as if he had been totally disabled.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHALEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REUBEN CLOUGH.

Mr. WHALEY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (S. No. 316) for the relief of Reuben Clough; which was laid on the table.

H. O. READ.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported back adversely the memorial of H. O. Read; which was laid on the table.

HENRY KARSTENS.

Mr. PERHAM also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Henry Karstens; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Henry Karstens, corporal company K, sixteenth Iowa volunteers, on the pension roll from 8th April, 1861, at the rate of eight dollars per month.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, made adverse reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon the petition of James McMurray, the petition of Caroline L. Wright, and the petition of Charles Lawrence; which were severally laid on the table.

He also reported back Senate bill No. 365, being an act in relation to pensions, with a recommendation that it be laid on the table, another bill upon the same subject having been already passed.

The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. L. MYERS, from the Committee on Patents, made adverse reports in the following cases:

The petition of Joseph Nock, praying for the renewal of a patent for an improved lock; the petition of John P. Sherwood, praying for an extension of patent; the petition of Francis N. Smith, for an extension of his patent for an improvement in corn-shellers; the petition of W. W. Woodworth, praying for a renewal and extension of a patent for planing machines; and they were severally laid on the table.

JOSIAH COPELAND.

Mr. L. MYERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to report a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to hear and determine the application of Josiah Copeland for an extension of his patent for a new and useful improvement in boot crimps.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. L. MYERS. I am sure the reasons I shall give will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and to the House. The committee are unanimous in recommending this extension. The invention is one of great simplicity and of great utility. It is now universally used, has superseded all other crimps used in the manufacturing and crimping of boots, and, as was fully shown to the committee, effects a considerable saving in this manufacture, both in time and leather. We have had petitions from numerous manufacturers of boots, and boot-crimpers, for this extension, and no one has opposed it. Owing to its simplicity of manufacture, and the ease with which it is counterfeited, there have been a number of infringements upon it, and a number of injunctions and judgments had to be obtained by the patentee. So that, excluding even his own labor, all he has gained from the invention does not exceed the sum of $5,000. Before the war, a dozen pair of these crimps were made for four dollars, each crimp including an iron block, clasp, and screw. Now, notwithstanding the great increase of the price of materials, a dozen pair of these crimps are made for $5 50, leaving a profit upon that number of but two dollars. The inventor has now got machinery, patterns, &c., at considerable expense, and deserves the remuneration which an extension of his patent alone will give him. This is the first request for a re-extension of patent that the Committee on Patents have voted favorably upon. They have reported adversely on almost every application, and I trust this bill will be passed at once. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER announced that the morning hour had expired.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

The House proceeded to consider, as the regular order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft.

The pending question was upon the motion to amend by inserting after the word "enrollment" in the eighth line of the second section the following words:

Provided, That persons not liable to enrollment or draft, who may hereafter volunteer, shall be credited to such sub-district as they may elect at the time of their enlistment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Objection was made yesterday to the proviso inserted upon my motion, on the ground that it might be retroactive and cut off credits already made. At the suggestion of some gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber, I move to amend by inserting after the word "troops" the word "hereafter;" so that the clause will read, "in any call for troops hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not see the propriety of this section. I believe that, if adopted, it will retard volunteering. I believe that General Hancock, who has been endeavoring to form a corps of twenty thousand men, would long ago have succeeded had not the War Department adopted a regulation similar to the provisions of this section. I know that at least two regiments from my county would have gone into that corps had they been permitted to take bounty from the highest bidder. When they found that they could not go where they could obtain the most favorable allowance as to bounty, they refused to enlist. I do not know, but I imagine that General Hancock, notwithstanding his ability as an officer, has signally failed in his efforts to raise that corps. I can see no reason why the poor soldier, who is willing to volunteer, should not get the highest bounty that he can. If one is willing to pay $500, and another refuses to pay anything, why should not these poor men be permitted to go and take the $500 for the benefit of their families? In that way you will fill the Army with volunteers instead of drafted men. I think that the soldier is entitled to all he can get, and therefore I am opposed to the whole section.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the motion. It is a little singular that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is so strongly opposed to free trade in gold, is in favor of free trade in substitutes, in the bodies and lives of men to fill the ranks of the Army. I believe that the Committee on Military Affairs has offered no proposition this session of such vital importance to the country in reference to raising soldiers for the Army as the section now before the House. I will endeavor to state briefly some of the reasons why it should be retained. As the law stands at present, citizens may enlist wherever they can get the highest bounty. The consequence is that in the rich districts, in the cities, in places where money is more plenty than men, high bounties will be offered, and the poorer districts will lose the men who go off and enlist in the rich districts, and thus the poor districts will be compelled to make up their quotas on the basis of the enrolled lists of the districts. It may be that in a township only one hundred men are enrolled; forty go off and enlist as substitutes in the rich districts; and while that township must make up its quota from the sixty who remain, the whole of the one hundred were reckoned as the basis on which the draft proceeds. The substitute brokerage system has grown out of this practice.

What is a substitute broker? A man who establishes an office and offers to furnish substitutes for different localities. He pays bounties and gathers men in gangs for sale, and when the committees of any town are hard pressed to fill up their quotas they send to the substitute broker and buy his wares at exorbitant rates. He gets men for comparatively a small bounty and sells them at enormous prices to the districts that are otherwise unable to provide to fill their quotas. The result has been that men in all parts of the United States have been compelled to see their sons bought and sold by these infamous substitute brokers. It is, sir, only a little less infamous than was the domestic slave trade in this country ten years ago. Now, in view of the great and sacred cause in which we are engaged, it does not become us to suffer the existence of a practice as nefarious as the slave trade. How shall we strike a blow at the evil? How shall we get at it? We do not in this section legislate against substitute brokers eo nomine, but we say that every district shall furnish its own complement of troops, and that wherever a man may have enlisted, wherever he may have gone as a substitute, he shall be credited to his own place of residence. That being done the occupation of a substitute broker is gone. There is then nothing for him to do, and he cannot set up an office in New York or Washington to buy substitutes for any other place, for when a substitute is obtained he is to be credited where he has been enrolled.

The learned gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] is right when he says that his county in Pennsylvania can raise its quota if permitted to go out into the poorer districts and buy substitutes. I grant that special localities will be favored, but it will be at the expense of the poorer districts. The effect of the substitute system on the Army is deplorable. Men who consent to sell themselves to the highest bidder will not be unwilling to desert the flag and under another name obtain a second bounty. It is a fact notorious in the Army that a large majority of the substitutes desert, and in many cases before they reach the field. For the credit of the Army, as well as to fill its ranks, I hope we shall enact this section into a law, and at one blow strike down the bounty jumping, substitute brokerage, and desertion consequent upon the present system. It is a crying evil all over the land, which has found expression in the Committee on Military Affairs, through petitions and letters, and demands the attention of Congress more than any other question which has been before the House this winter. Whatever else may be done to this bill, I hope the second section will be left intact, unless it be improved in detail. I know of no measure more important than this, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Is it in order to amend the original bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the second section by striking out the word "hereafter" in the first line. I move the amendment to enable me to add a word or two to what has been so well said by the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. The only regret I have in relation to this matter is, that the Committee on Military Affairs did not feel the force and necessity of a provision of this character at the last session of Congress. In the rural districts of the West we have suffered severely in consequence of that oversight. Our people have been taken away by substitute brokers into the market and sold to fill up the quota of States which were much more able to fill their quotas than we were.

But not only have we suffered from that oversight, but it will be recollected that Congress passed an act authorizing agents to go into other States to make up their quotas. What has been the effect? It has enabled certain States, that had wealth, to fill their quotas with negroes from the plantations of the South, while we have been compelled to fill our quotas from among our own citizens. The complaint we have now to make is, that this remedy comes too late. Having filled their ranks with negroes from the plantations of the South, they propose now to repeal that provision of the bill, and shut us out from availing ourselves of the same benefits.

This provision ought not only to pass, but before it is passed it ought to be made still stronger. We ought to be entitled to go back and have credit for the men that other States have taken away from us. Let me give you an instance of the operation of this law: within the last three months, in my own precinct—a district which has heretofore kept its quota full by volunteering—and during the month of December, thirty-nine recruits were furnished by that precinct to another State. We are not only charged with our own quota, but we fail to get credit for these thirty-nine additional men—enough to fill our quota under this call.

I repeat that we ought not only to have a provision which shall hereafter prevent one State or one district from going into another State or district to get recruits, but we ought to be allowed to go back and give those districts which have furnished more than their quotas heretofore credit for the men they have furnished to other States and localities. That would be approximating to something like justice in the case.

I have therefore moved to amend by striking out the word "hereafter" in the first line, so as to allow the proper officers to adjust the credits which belong to each locality.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope no such amendment as that will prevail. I think myself, with the gentleman from Illinois, that it is greatly to be regretted that the policy proposed by this second section did not prevail from the beginning. I have always been of opinion that the whole bounty and substitute system was wrong, and if the war were to continue all would at length come to that conclusion. This section, however, cures one very great evil in the country, and prevents that very thing which commends itself to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS]—the bidding of rich districts and cities against each other, and the drawing from the rural districts all their fighting population, so as to render them unable to fill their own quotas when the draft comes.

But if we should admit the amendment which the gentleman now proposes there is a practical difficulty in carrying it into effect at all. There has been no such record kept from the beginning of the war by which it would be possible to credit each district and sub-district with the number of troops they have furnished. It is a matter of notoriety that a very large proportion of the first five or seven volunteer infantry regiments which West Virginia raised for this war were actually raised on the other side of the river Ohio.

Mr. BLAIR. The State of Ohio also got men on our side of the river.

Mr. SCHENCK. Perhaps so; but not so many as she gave to West Virginia.

Mr. BLAIR. She paid larger bounties.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not mean any disrespect to the people of West Virginia. They are very good soldiers on either side of the river. I know something about the good services rendered by them. A large proportion of these West Virginia regiments came from the Ohio side of the river, and partly from Pennsylvania. Why was that? Because, at the commencement of the war, it was felt that to defend the border was as much the work of the people on one side the river as of the people on the other side; and that when they went into these regiments they were defending Ohio, Pennsylvania, and the whole country. Ohio has never undertaken to claim credits for her citizens who went into West Virginia regiments.

Mr. WHALEY. The people of West Virginia have furnished as many men to Ohio regiments as Ohio has furnished to the West Virginia regiments.

Mr. SCHENCK. It may be so. I will not dispute it. But it is not according to my recollection, or understanding, or knowledge of the facts, and I happened to command some of those regiments. But let that all go. I did not intend any slur on the gallantry of either of the gentlemen representing West Virginia, or of her troops; nor any imputation on the readiness of West Virginia to give her best blood to the cause of the country. It was only an illustration, which has stirred the bile of these gentlemen, used to show the impracticability of carrying out the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.]

The amendment adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] which will prevent all bogus credits hereafter, taken together with the text of this section, will cure the evil for all time to come, and for at least the present and preceding draft. I hope, therefore, that the section will be permitted to remain as it is, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted, but that this whole provision will be carried out in its present form, with the amendments already adopted.

The question was taken on Mr. J. C. ALLEN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to amend the second section by striking out the following:

That hereafter all persons mustered into the military or naval service, whether as volunteers, substitutes, representative or otherwise, shall be credited to the State and to the ward, township, precinct, or other enrollment sub-district where such persons belong by actual residence, (if such persons have an actual residence,) and where such persons were or shall be enrolled, (if liable to enrollment.)

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That hereafter all persons liable to a draft mustered into the military or naval service shall be credited to the State and to the ward, township, precinct, or other enrollment sub-district where such persons were or shall be enrolled.

The effect of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, would be that all persons who are enrolled and who are hereafter mustered into service would be credited to the towns where they are enrolled. But it would leave men who have already served two years, and who are not liable to enrollment or to draft, to enlist to the credit of whatever town, county, or State they may choose. The law should certainly secure to each township all the men enrolled in it. But why should we go further than that? Why should we say that a man who goes as a substitute for another, when he is not liable to draft, should be credited only to the locality from which he came originally? I do not see why.

Now what would be the effect of making this the law? The large cities, that are full of emigrants, full of persons not liable to the draft, can raise their quotas easily by substitutes, and thus avoid the draft altogether. But in the rural districts there is no such class to draw from for the purpose of substitutes. If you save to the towns the men enrolled there, that is all that justice requires. To go further than that would be dealing unjustly with individuals, and would be really conferring no benefit on any town except the large cities that have a monopoly of foreign emigrants.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman is aware that persons who have served for two years during this rebellion are exempted from enrollment and draft. Inasmuch as his amendment provides for the benefit only of those places to which the person belongs and where he has his actual residence, and where such persons were or shall be enrolled, it does not alter the effect of the section at all.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. But the substitute must be credited where he resides.

Mr. SCHENCK. The two things must go together, the residence and enrollment. These exemptions are not liable to enrollment anywhere.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. MILLER, of New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the section by inserting after the words "if liable to enrollment" the following:

"And hereafter, whenever a call for troops shall have been made by the President, and the quotas of the several sub-districts shall have been fixed, the same, with the ratio or percentage of the quota upon the enrollment, shall be published and made known; and thereafter it shall be lawful for any number of persons residing in any sub-district to put in an acceptable substitute in their several names, and thereupon the names of those persons putting in such substitutes shall not be held liable to the then pending draft: Provided, That the number of persons putting in such substitutes shall not exceed the number of persons required by the ratio to furnish one man of the quota drafted.

I am opposed to the section as it now stands, because I am opposed to changing the system of credits after the people have gone into it now and understand it. I cannot see that the objection is sound which has been taken here, on the ground, as they say, that certain sub-districts or districts have been exhausted of their population liable to draft by the more wealthy districts which offer large bounties. In the event of a new enrollment these districts which have been exhausted of their able-bodied population will not be called upon to furnish more than their quota upon their enrollment as it shall stand when the enrollment is made.

Now, if this section must stand as it now is, and parties are not permitted to go out of their respective sub-districts for the purpose of obtaining substitutes, then what will be done in many of the sub-districts, townships, and boroughs where the authorities refuse to appropriate money or levy a tax upon the people of the district or borough for the purpose of obtaining volunteers to fill their quotas? The persons there are willing to do everything in their power to fill their quotas, and yet, because they have not the authority from the authorities of their respective districts, they are put off from putting in substitutes. Under the existing law any man can put in a substitute for three years, and thereby becomes exempt for that length of time.

Now, my proposition is that any number of persons residing in any sub-district shall have the privilege, under regulations prescribed by the Provost Marshal General, to put in acceptable substitutes in their names, and thereupon their names shall not be put in the then pending draft; provided that the number of persons so putting in substitutes shall not exceed the number of persons who under the apportionment of the quota are required to furnish one man each. This will operate fairly, and will allow parties who are willing to furnish substitutes for the pending draft when the authorities of the districts under the laws of Pennsylvania, and I believe in other States of the Union, refuse to act. I think the proposition is entirely fair. It is extending the privilege of putting in personal substitutes beyond that of one man putting in a substitute for himself, and allowing parties to associate themselves together and put in substitutes for that one draft.

Mr. CHANLER. I think this amendment is injudicious, and will not effect the object the gentleman has in view. I believe from the organization of the bureau having charge of this whole matter of enrollment, and from all the facts connected with this matter of quotas, it is utterly useless to endeavor to amend this section until we strike out all after the eighth line. By this section you give power to the Provost Marshal General to make such rules and give such instructions to the assistant provost marshals, the boards of enrollment, and mustering officers, as shall be necessary for the faithful enforcement of the provisions of this section, to the end that fair and just credit shall be given to every section of the country. You surrender to that officer full power with regard to the adjustment of this whole matter, in the face of existing evils, in the face of this disordered system in which confusion worse confounded glares through military bureaus like a monster of crime caged in an arsenal of deadly weapons, threatening to break his bonds and destroy his keeper and his prison. You surrender power through the Provost Marshal General to the Executive, whose authority is already too great, and is becoming dangerous.

Sir, in authorizing the Provost Marshal General to make such rules and regulations as he may see fit, we have no guarantee that those rules and regulations will be such as a proper sense of duty should induce this body to provide for. There is no section of the country which has not been harassed by the intolerable outrages committed by these bounty swindlers, who are the natural offspring of this system of drafting. The Provost Marshal has thus far produced a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding. When the gentlemen of the Military Committee say that this system is as bad as the slave trade, I say yes; indeed it is the sum of all villainies. But the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] a member of that committee, says that, eo nomine, he will not assail the bounty swindlers. Why not? Because he is afraid to interfere in this trade. He dare not assail this class of wealthy scoundrels whom he and his colleagues have called into being under this system of conscription. He and his friends, who have been howling about the horrors of slavery, and the abominations of that trade in human flesh, who have succeeded by such appeals in exciting this country to civil war, now refuse in the face of an acknowledged evil created by themselves to assail that evil by its name on this floor.

Sir, I am not astonished that the gentlemen on the Military Committee are desirous to give to the Provost Marshal General full power to make a fair adjustment of the credits of each district. They know that any adjustment which he may make cannot be a fair adjustment. They know that this conscription system teems with crime and bristles with horrid abuses. They know that for an honest man to undertake to regulate this matter of drafting is to mix himself with crime and brand himself with infamy. Since the conscription law became the basis of our military code, every citizen who could bought a substitute; every township vied with its neighbor in raising the price of blood, until the market for human beings became like the famous slave pens of which gentlemen on the other side talk so long and loud. A new trade is springing up among us, with its ramifications reaching to the remote regions of northern and western Europe. Soon Asia, and perhaps Africa, may be honored by the emissaries of modern philanthropists on the other side of the House, with an invitation to furnish substitutes to fill the quotas of certain States, under the repeated calls for more men to carry out the indefinite policy of this Administration. No man knows to-day whether we may not in a year from this be forced to import coolies from China, or a body-guard from the sable army of the King of Dahomey; nor is it unreasonable to suppose from our past conduct that, so long as the carnage can be fatal to others than ourselves, we will care to stop its progress, or turn the policy of the Administration back to the original sources of power fixed by the Constitution.

This whole scheme for raising an army seems not only the most tyrannical measure ever passed by the Legislature of a free people, but it is abhorrent to any sentiment of justice and civilization. It cannot be urged any longer under the specious plea of military necessity. Our armies are victorious. The rebellion is crushed, if not utterly overthrown. Peace must soon follow victory. Our victorious troops are now achieving the catastrophe which overtakes traitors in arms. The coming spring will bring with it the renewed vigor of our veterans in the field, and every regiment may be filled by a proper appeal to the patriotism of the people to fight for the cause of their country in the future as in the past; then as at the beginning of the war. But this new call is a threat, a scandal, and an injustice. It puts a new and keener edge upon the blood-hound instincts of the bounty swindler, raises the price of human flesh in the shambles of our military bureau, and brands a zealous and brave people with insult and ignominy. If our forces need replenishing, use the legitimate means furnished by the Constitution. Rely on the States for support.

If the national existence is threatened, call out the whole white male population without distinction, between the proper and usual military ages fixed by custom and experience. But do not confirm by a continuance of this law the dangerous, unnecessary, unconstitutional precedent which hangs about the neck of this bill, and would, but for the strong arm of the Executive and the audacity of his Cabinet, strangle it in this or any Congress of a free people. This measure reeks with useless blood and bristles with horrid abuses.

The bounty is a medium for filling the ranks with lunatics, convicted criminals, and drunken dupes, who no one but he who escapes conscription by their aid will deny make turbulent and bad soldiers. The madhouse and the jail are fished to save sane and capable citizens from a positive duty. The strictest law to prevent enlisting unfit persons cannot remedy the evil. Evils of such hard, and unfair, and narrow enactments as conscription in this country is connived at and encouraged by popular opinion; and until the violator of the law be "actually in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger," there is no constitutional power which can deprive him of a trial by jury, the consequences of which may easily be foreseen, namely, he would be almost certain to escape final conviction by the local civil courts; or the whole country must be put under martial law by the enlarged powers of a military commission created for these special evils and to correct a wrong inseparable from the draft and bounty.

The bounty system as now established is the means of filling quotas of States on paper, but does not fill the Army with soldiers, and induces men to desert, to reenlist for a new bounty. Veterans, the main stay of every army, are seduced from their old regiments to enlist in those being newly organized. The organization of the Army is thereby impaired. It offers a premium to vagabonds and thieves to sell themselves as substitutes to the substitute broker, enlist and demoralize the character of the Army.

Great injustice is done to certain States by the bribe offered through local and State bounties. The less wealthy State, being thereby deprived of her legitimate means of filling her quota by substitutes, is finally compelled to resort to a draft, while her rich neighbor saves her citizens from that scourge at the expense of a few dollars, and recruits her regiments with men not her citizens. The bounty system permits the citizen to evade military duty, one of the most important that rests upon him, while it creates a mercenary army and puts the existence of the Union in jeopardy. To enforce the draft in each congressional district the right of trial by jury must be superseded by a military commission, which is a most dangerous precedent, if not utterly unconstitutional. It produces a conflict between the court of law and the military tribunals.

The bad management, vacillation, and incompetency of the officers of the Government having charge of the draft, the inherent defects of the system, have stopped volunteering, and made high bounties necessary, although the country has, according to the best authority, more men in it fit for duty to-day than when the war began.

There is no want of men to fill the Army; but there is no sympathy in the hearts of the people with the reckless and wicked system by which the enlistments are made and the war conducted. The apathy of the people is a rebuke to the Administration. It is a political Nemesis pursuing a party which has insulted a devoted and eager nation by fastening on it a conscript law in violation of every instinct of a free representative Government. The curse which ever follows cruelty and tyranny is close upon this Administration. The thousands of brave men butchered in the Wilderness are now needed to take the field for an onward march. The Wilderness refuses to give up its dead; the living are loth to perish in the Wilderness; each man would sacrifice his neighbor as a scape-goat in this tribute of blood. The people of the North who protested so often and so vainly against the violations of the Constitution by the party in power; the Democratic masses who dared to rebuke the mad career of the majority by sending a strong Opposition to Congress, are now soon to be forced into the Army to sustain those who never ceased reviling them as traitors.

tors and as sympathizers with the enemy they are invited to fight. Why do you trust your cause to men you deem traitors? Why do you call on the people of New York city to sustain this Administration by its quota? Is there not danger that the Army made up of such men as you say they are will turn on you? Why does the United States recruit among men whom their whole policy has exasperated and insulted, and who have been robbed, kidnapped, and imprisoned at will by taxation, conscription, and arbitrary arrests? Are you afraid to take the field yourselves, that you intrust the cause of emancipation and the honor of your country to men whom you daily accuse of treason?

Can this Administration complain that the people do not enlist as volunteers? Certainly not. When they offered their services to the country they were ordered back with a threat that a draft would supply the soldiers needed for this war by this Administration. The draft is the result of our policy; bounty-swindling is the result of the draft. It rests like a pestilential cloud over the whole nation, foreboding corruption, usurpation, and crime—corruption of the people, usurpation by the Executive, crime by the despicable tools who hunt for substitutes and trade in the lives of their fellow-men. Fellow-men! No, sir; such creatures have no fellows save fiends and vipers. The pirate who scuttles a ship at sea, steals the cargo, and kills the crew, or sends them to the bottom with the ship; the murderer who calmly plans his crime while enjoying the hospitality of his victim; the wretch who fires the house of the unwary citizen whose doors were opened in a spirit of charity to a seeming wanderer; the false friend who lures a confiding soul to ruin, are the fit companions of those who live by this trade in human flesh—"the sum of all villainies."

Sir, in view of the depraved, dangerous, and unjust character of this system, the natural result of the enrollment acts passed by this House, it is not unreasonable to suppose that some broad, sound and patriotic reason would have been advanced, in extenuation of this amendment to the existing law. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has some most excellent argument in reserve. Up to this date Congress and the country have been kept in the dark as to the course to be followed in regard to the new call of the President. Up to a few days since it was officially announced that the quota for the city of New York would amount to four thousand four hundred and thirty-three men as originally called for. Now, by a juggle in the War Office and a ukase from the Provost Marshal General, we have been ordered to furnish twenty-one thousand men in a few weeks from this date. Since then, without due explanation, but on the "ipse dixit" of the Secretary of War, another change has been made. To-morrow we may have another decree fixing another quota, and that, after the large and repeated calls for troops from that devoted city during this war.

The speculators in human flesh throng to New York city from all sections to outbid one another in the market furnished by immigration and created by conscription. In self-defense, to meet the exigencies of the case, and if possible make good out of evil, our local board of supervisors, made up equally of both political parties, have organized a committee who regulate the matter as far as lies in their power, at once protecting the poor victim of this law and regulating the nefarious traffic by a reasonable standard. The plague has been introduced by the party in power here, who should have protected us, and from whom there is no appeal; in despair from its ravages we have inoculated those in our midst, willing to suffer, that the whole body-politic may not be corrupted and then sacrificed in their defenseless ignorance.

The same evil exists in every congressional district, in every town and city of the country. The memorial of the mayor of Philadelphia and others, members of the Loyal League of that city, is a complete and forcible appeal in behalf of decency, humanity, and justice, against this system. The Legislature of Rhode Island has petitioned for a delay of the new draft. A commission from the Legislature of Pennsylvania has asked for mercy from the Executive under this cruel law. The whole nation will soon raise a hue and cry against the perpetrators, aiders, abettors, and originators of the nefarious scheme, or sink itself under the odium of its complicity with crimes Christianity forbids and virtue detests, and live on demoralized and disgraced before the world. The military system of the State is rotten, and if borne with longer threatens to convert the whole country into one mass of moral and political decay. It would be unjust to the military system which has grown so big and dangerous to its supporters under the enrollment act were we to dismiss this subject without alluding to a change which has come over the spirit of its dream since the rebellion first broke out. I refer to those who reap the profit which war bestows; not to the honest and brave soldiers in the ranks, nor to the skillful and pure-minded officers who have led them over hard-won fields to final victory.

The object of this war has, in the minds of a certain class of soldiers, apparently undergone a thorough revolution, a revolution within a revolution, a wheel within a wheel. To their minds the war has been perverted from the direction given it by the pure principles of patriotism which first moved the people to rescue our flag from threatened dishonor. Speculation, political ambition, party rivalry, and personal jealousy have wrought a baneful and wide-spread influence in our councils and in our camps. The maddest fanatics have become fat nabobs, princely scions of the royal tree of cotton. Battles have been won and lost around the sacred precincts where lies in state the silver-haired King Cotton, who is torn piecemeal like another Priam in another Troy wrapped in flames, and perishes amid his lieges at the altar of Mammon. His baleful influence extends through the thick padding of a well-stuffed uniform and penetrates to the inner chords of the heart of these commercial heroes who pass within gunshot of a plantation. Sugar, too, has shed its sweet influence over the stern usages of war; and generals who were blind to the blandishments and deaf to the prayers of their captives, and fierce in denunciation of traitors, have quelled the spirit of strife in obedience to the law of trade. Gold, the love of which is a root, has met with deep sympathy from the radicals, as its yellow face grinned through the bars of iron-proof safes with such winsomeness that the severest virtue has been induced to jeopardize honor, fame, and military rank, not in covetousness; oh, no! nor with intent of felony, but for the bare satisfaction of fingering the precious stuff to soothe an itching palm for a year or so, in trust.

The war necessity which once existed for the draft, according to the case made up by this Administration, sleeps, and no longer rings its steel chime as a knell to our suspended Constitution, the first and noblest victim to its rage. Commercial necessity and financial necessity now chant a requiem over the fallen currency and crippled credit of the country, both "in extremis," moribund of superficial fanaticism and internal corruption. The plea—cruel, tyrannical, overwhelming—of military necessity is gone as an argument from this Administration, and I hope this place will know it no more. With it should disappear the whole superstructure of draft, confiscation, arbitrary arrests, and the executive nebulae of proclamations which have so streaked the sky that the stars and stripes can scarcely be distinguished. It is now time to set the military system of the country free forever from this plea of necessity. Limit the exploits of our generals to the legitimate trade of war and we will not need the repeated calls for drafts. Limit our military expeditions to conquering the armies and taking the forts—Fisher and others like it; forbid and punish wild-goose chases almost to the sources of the Red river after cotton, and we will not need cruel laws to enforce enrollment. We then may dispense with the bounty swindler together with the cotton speculator, the gold robber, and the dealer in permits to trade with the rebels, all at one fell swoop. Stop supplying the enemy with the sinews of war by the million, and then we may listen patiently to the President's call for three hundred thousand more loyal hearts to be plucked from the bosom of society by the ruthless hand of an irresponsible provost marshal through an order from the War Department under the pretext of military necessity.

Yet the gentleman from Ohio says that while he gives all these powers to the Provost Marshal

General, and makes him superintendent of bounty swindling in this country, eo nomine, he will not assail this organized system of crime, this outrage against humanity! Yet day by day the majority in this House confiscate property; they trample upon the rights of citizens of both sections of the country under the miserable plea of false philanthropy. Such philanthropy is a falsehood on its face.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that debate be closed on this section.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, was disagreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, submitted the following amendment:

Provided further, That aliens and others not permanently residing in any duly organized enrollment district may be credited to the town or sub-district whose authorized agents procure their enlistment without the intervention of substitute brokers, and under such regulations as may be provided by the War Department.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's motion to strike out the section; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, moved to strike out the words "if liable to enrollment."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROSS moved to add the following:

Provided, That all persons mustered into the military service of the United States under this act, or the several acts to which this is an amendment, and all persons now in said service, shall be paid at the rate of twenty dollars per month for such service from and after the 1st day of March next.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point that the amendment is not germane, and therefore not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the following amendment as a new section:

That in every case where any regiment, battalion, or company has been mustered out of the service of the United States by reason of the expiration of the term for which such organization had been accepted, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause immediately to be mustered out all those non-commissioned officers and privates who, during the years 1862 and 1863 were enlisted with the assurance and understanding that they were to serve only for the unexpired term of any such organization; and in cases where regiments, battalions, and companies have not yet been mustered out, then such non-commissioned officers and privates as are above described he shall cause to be mustered out whenever the term of such organization shall expire: Provided, That before any such enlisted man is mustered out he shall sign a statement under oath that he enlisted with the distinct assurance and understanding that he engaged to serve only for the unexpired term of the organization into which he was mustered, such statement to be verified by the recruiting officer by whom he was enlisted, or by some commissioned officer having actual and personal knowledge of the facts in the case.

Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that this is the same proposition reported to the House by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in pursuance of a resolution submitted by me and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs on the 15th day of December last. It passed the House, but it is now manifest by the action of the Senate that this measure must, to secure ultimate action, be ingrafted on some general bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, as the House closed debate on the second section, and this is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret that debate is not in order, but I ask that the report made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred H. R. 433, also memorials of the Governor and Legislature of the State of Indiana, together with sundry petitions in reference to the discharge of certain soldiers enlisted into the military service in the years 1862 and 1863, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave respectfully to report:

That during the years 1862 and 1863 a considerable number of persons volunteered into the military service, enlisting in regiments or companies already organized and in the field, with the understanding that they would be mustered out with their regiments or companies.

The terms of enlistment of many such regiments have now expired, and others will soon expire, but the persons who enlisted subsequent to the organization of the regiments or companies are held to serve three years from the date of their enlistment. In the petitions before the committee nearly all the loyal States west of the Hudson river are represented.

The petitioners set forth that they enlisted with the positive assurance that they were to be held only for the unexpired term of their regiments; that notices to that effect were given in handbills and the public papers; that this short term of service was offered by recruiting officers as an inducement to them to enlist, and that the United States mustering officers in some instances confirmed the statements of recruiting officers by telling the recruits that though, as a necessary technical form, the muster-in rolls fixed the term of enlistment at three years, they would be held only till their regiments or companies were mustered out.

It is alleged in the evidence before the committee that, in many instances, recruits declined to sign the muster-in rolls till this assurance was given. Your committee find that a large number of regiments have recently gone out of the service, leaving squads of from twenty to one hundred men to be distributed among other regiments to serve out the remainder of their three years, and that the men thus left feel greatly aggrieved, and believe that the Government has not treated them in good faith. With a single exception, the rolls in the War Department show no evidence that these men were mustered for any term less than three years.

The justice of their claim to be mustered out with their organizations depends mainly on the question whether the Government authorized or allowed assurances to that effect to be given them. The following documents show what the action of the War Department has been at various times:

[General Orders, No. 108.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, April 28, 1864.

1. Whenever volunteer troops are mustered out of service, the entire regiment or other organization will be considered as mustered out at one time and place, except prisoners of war, who will be considered as in service until their arrival in a loyal State, with an allowance of time necessary for them to return to their respective places of enrollment.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, September 28, 1862.

Sir: In reply to yours of the 21st instant, stating the number of regiments raised and to be raised in your State, and also making suggestions in reference to filling old regiments, I am directed to say that recruits for old regiments of volunteers for three years or during the war will be discharged at the expiration of the term for which the regiment was originally enlisted.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Brigadier General and Acting Adjutant General.
His Excellency Governor KIRKWOOD, of Iowa.

The following papers relating to enlistments in Massachusetts, and purporting to be copies of the letters called for from the Secretary of War in House resolution of December 15, 1864, were referred to the committee:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 21, 1863.

Recruits for Massachusetts regiments, enlisted with conditions that they should be discharged when their regiments should be mustered out of service, as per General Order No. 28, headquarters, State of Massachusetts, series 1863, will be permitted to reenlist as veterans under the same conditions as other men in the regiments.

This permission is applicable only to the men in question, and cannot be extended to other States. The authority to enlist men with condition that they should be discharged with their regiments was special and peculiar, and given only to the Governor of Massachusetts. It must be distinctly understood, however, that the men so enlisting cannot get the $100 bounty provided by section six of the act of July 22, 1861, General Order 49, same year, unless they serve two years under original enlistment.

The foregoing is the decision of the War Department.

THOMAS M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Brigadier General S. WILLIAMS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 22, 1863.

Sir: I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you that recruits from Massachusetts regiments, enlisted under provisions of General Order 28, headquarters State of Massachusetts, July 23, 1862, will be discharged when the term of service of the regiment expires.

All recruits so enlisted will be entitled to reenlist as veteran volunteers so soon as they have been in the service two years.

I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant General.

His Excellency GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, Massachusetts.

In the letter of the Secretary of War of January 28, 1865, in response to House resolutions of December 15, 1864, calling for copies of the above letters, the following are copied from the files of the Department:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1862—4.15 p.m.

Governor ANDREW, Boston:

You are authorized to say that new recruits for old regiments will be mustered with the regiment.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

The foregoing telegram is given as it was written and transmitted, but Governor Andrew claimed, and no doubt correctly, that the word "out" was designed to follow the word "mustered," but had been inadvertently omitted, and that he had so understood and acted upon it. This view has been assented to by the Department, so that it should read as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1862—4.15 p. m.

Governor ANDREW, Boston:

You are authorized to say that new recruits for old regiments will be mustered out with the regiment.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 28, 1864.

Sir: The Secretary of War directs me to inform you that all men enlisted in volunteer organizations from Massachusetts for the unexpired term of service of regiments, pursuant to his telegram of July 21, 1862, will be mustered out of service and discharged with the regiments to which they belong. It is, of course, unnecessary to add that this rule is not now in force.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL BRECK,
Assistant Adjutant General.

His Excellency JOHN A. ANDREW,
Governor of Massachusetts, Boston.

Two days after the receipt of the telegram of July 21, 1862, as given above, the following general order was issued by the Governor of Massachusetts, and enlistments into all regiments of that State were made accordingly:

[General Orders, No. 28.]

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, July 23, 1862.

1. By authority from the honorable the Secretary of War, it is hereby declared by the Governor that all soldiers who may enlist in any of the regiments of three years' volunteers will be discharged whenever their regiments are mustered out of service, in the same manner as those soldiers who enlisted at the time when those regiments were organized.

By order of his Excellency,

JOHN A. ANDREW,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.
WILLIAM SCHOULER,
Adjutant General.

From these documents it is manifest that at least two of the States were in 1862 expressly permitted, by authority of the War Department, to enlist men for the unexpired term of regiments then in the field, and the language, both of the letter to the Governor of Iowa and the telegram to the Governor of Massachusetts, would create a fair presumption that the rule of enlistment was general. There is nothing in these communications which would lead the people to suppose that the permission granted was "special and peculiar, and granted only to the Governor of Massachusetts."

It is, therefore, not difficult to understand how Governors, military committees, recruiting officers, and citizens in other States, were led to suppose that their soldiers would be enlisted on the same terms as those from Massachusetts and Iowa. That they did proceed on that supposition, and that the ranks of old regiments, thinned by from six to twelve months of battle and disease, were filled by volunteers to serve for the unexpired term of the regiment, and that, too, when in several States a draft for nine months' men was impending, is beyond question.

In view of these facts and considerations the duty of Congress is plain. The War Department has no authority to go behind the official record contained in the muster-roll. The remedy is in Congress. Your committee are very reluctant to recommend any measure which may tend to weaken or diminish our armies in the field. It is always a calamity to lose a veteran soldier from the service, and the passage of the accompanying resolution will authorize the discharge of a considerable number of valuable soldiers from the ranks; but your committee, believing it of still greater consequence that the Government deal justly and keep faith with its faithful soldiers, are not willing that the petitioners, now on duty in the field, shall be compelled to serve under a contract which they believe to be fraudulent on the part of the Government.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have already acted on that matter in a separate bill which has gone to the Senate. I do not think that we can compel the Senate to act on it any sooner by putting it here.

Mr. HOLMAN. The importance of this is manifest, and it will have a better chance in this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the third section, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in computing quotas hereafter credit shall be given to the several States, districts, and sub-districts, for all men furnished from them respectively, and not heretofore credited during the present rebellion, for any period of service of not less than three months, calculating the number of days for which such service was furnished, and reducing the same to years. Provided, That such credits shall not be applied to the call for additional troops made by the President on the 21st day of December, 1864.

Mr. NOBLE. I move to strike out the proviso, for the simple reason that it will only do exact justice to those States which have furnished a large amount of service in 1864. I trust there is on the part of the House a disposition to do justice to those States which furnished this service. I will say that the State of Ohio furnished in 1864 thirty-six thousand men for one hundred days. Those men were really taken from their employment for almost a whole year. They did not return within the one hundred days, nor were they immediately mustered in after the call. They were taken mostly from the agricultural districts during the very period of the year when they could be employed in their particular vocation. I think that we should have credit for those men.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state why that proviso was inserted and why the Committee on Military Affairs have thought it best to insert it as a part of this section. The whole section is to cover precisely the cases referred to by my colleague.

Since the commencement of this war a great many troops have been furnished for periods of three months; and during the last summer something near sixty thousand troops were furnished by different States for the period of one hundred days. It seems to me that no man can overestimate, in their effect upon the war, and upon the campaign of the last season, the services rendered by those troops. The people and soldiers of those States responded to the call made upon them, and made their arrangements to furnish those hundred days' troops. Like my colleague who makes this motion, I am proud, at any rate, of the share Ohio took in that matter. Finding that in the campaign of last summer Grant absolutely required to be reinforced by the troops that were scattered along our railroads as guards, and that were garrisoning the different fortifications of the country, it became necessary to know how upon a sudden, without waiting for a draft, or the slow process of recruiting, a body of men could be obtained to put into garrisons and on guard in the place of those old troops. In this contingency the Governors of Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, and Michigan tendered to the Government eighty thousand men. The share of Ohio was to be thirty thousand. Within about fourteen days Ohio furnished not only thirty thousand, but, owing to the organized state of her militia, she furnished thirty-six thousand, being nearly forty full regiments. All the other States, behindhand in their militia organizations, finally succeeded in getting and furnishing twenty-six thousand troops. The eighty thousand were never furnished; but out of the sixty thousand Ohio gave upward of thirty-six thousand. Nobody can appreciate justly the value of the services of those men. They not only guarded our railroads and garrisoned our fortifications, but many of them asked to be sent to the field. Many of them did go, and they fell upon the field; were taken prisoners, and many of them are now lingering in southern prisons. They did what other soldiers did. The arrival of the first seventeen thousand from Ohio released forty-two thousand veteran troops around this city, who hurried to the relief and reinforcement of Grant.

But the difficulty of this matter is here. In the first place there was an absolute agreement, when these troops were furnished, that they should not be credited upon any call. Now the Committee on Military Affairs, looking back upon the subject, and upon the efficiency of those troops and upon what services they performed, thought that the States should not be held to a strict fulfillment of the agreement, but that they ought to have credit for those troops, calculating the number of days for which such service was rendered, and reducing the same to years. But while the committee propose to give credit for such troops who have served over a hundred days, they have thought proper to provide that they shall not be credited upon the draft now going on, for the reason that it would interfere with all the arrangements which have been made for this draft.

Mr. NOBLE. Is it not true that the people of Ohio and the other States who furnished these troops had no knowledge of any such arrangement as that spoken of by the gentleman from Ohio; and is it not true that the knowledge never came to the minds of the people until this winter?

Mr. SCHENCK. I knew it, and it was published in the papers at the time. Such an agreement was made, but the people were not a party to it, except through their Governors. I think with my friend from Ohio, my colleague, that there is no question about the equity of making this allowance. It is a question of expediency whether we will do it upon this draft and thereby disturb all the calculations of the quotas of the States.

Mr. NOBLE. I know that at least one hundred of my constituents, one hundred days' men, fell in the engagement around this city, and their bones lie bleaching around Washington, or have been carried to their homes. I think it very unjust to Ohio unless the Ohio men be credited now. It cannot be presumed that we are going to have a dozen drafts, or many more, if any; and a credit proposed to be applied hereafter is not such a credit as the equity of the case demands. I think we ought to have the credit now, because I do not apprehend that we shall have many more opportunities to have the credit applied.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman cannot be ahead of my own disposition to credit my State, and all other States and sub-districts, with their proper number of men, but I have suggested the reason why we propose not to do it now. It all lies in a question of expediency, the almost utter inability of getting at it now without unsettling everything which has been done in preparing for the draft. If we could have got at this subject at an early day, and could have legislated on it before the draft, as I would have preferred to do, then it might have been well enough to have taken the view of it which my colleague [Mr. NOBLE] takes.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 314) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased;

An act (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Mary Shircliff;

An act (H. R. No. 543) to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army; and

An act (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. COBB, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall; and

An act (H. R. No. 728) to pay to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension roll, $300 annually, as a gratuity, in addition to the pension now paid them.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 387) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts, approved March 3, 1863;"

An act (S. No. 295) making additional grants of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State;

Joint resolution (S. No. 114) authorizing additional copies of public documents to be printed for the Department of State;

Joint resolution (S. No. 122) relating to international exhibitions at Bergen, in Norway, and Oporto, in Portugal, during the summer of 1865; and Joint resolution (S. No. 121) to purchase mail pouches or boxes, of Marshall Smith's patent, for the postal service, and for other purposes.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last line. This question of allowing credit for the hundred-day men furnished by the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, is a very important one. I feel the force of the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the call was made under agreement with the Governors of those States that no credit would be asked for them. Still, sir, these men were furnished. Many of them went into the battlefield, and all of them were stationed at some important military post, where their services were supposed to be most profitable to the Government. They were called out at a time when the climate of the South was most unhealthy, and many of them contracted disease from which they have not recovered. In a word, they endured all the hardships and performed all the duties incumbent upon any soldier in our armies during their term of service. They were furnished by those States, out of an anxiety to aid the Government in its exigency.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the fact of this having been tendered as a free-will offering is no reason why these States should not now be credited with the men furnished. We are told that we had better not strike out the proviso, for the reason that, if we do, it will cause some difficulty in adjusting the quotas of these States. That is an argument which ought not to obtain here. These northwestern States that furnished the hundred-day men are responding promptly to the last call of the President; and I am rejoiced to learn from the adjutant general of our State that no draft will be necessary. Still it is but a matter of justice that the State should get credit for these hundred-day men, and let that credit go to the next call, if we are unfortunate enough to have another. I hope, therefore, that this proviso will be struck out. The War Department can afford to undergo the difficulty and trouble of adjusting the quotas. It can certainly afford it better than these States can afford to lose the benefit of that credit. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. I desire to move to amend this section by striking out the word "hereafter," in the first clause of the section.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NOBLE,] to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That such credits shall not be applied to the call for additional troops made by the President on the 21st day of December, 1864.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays upon that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 72, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Arnold, Bally, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Brandegee, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finch, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Macey, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Benjamin C. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Ames Myers, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seefeld, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Sweat, Thayer, Tracy, Unson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Eden, English, Ganson, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinlay, Middleton, William H. Miller, Leonard Myers, Odell, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Spalding, William G. Steele, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wilder, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the section by adding to it the following:

And provided further, That the period of actual service rendered up to the date of the call for troops shall alone be taken into account in making up the credits due States.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the law now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that the Attorney General has rendered a decision to-day contrary to the opinion the gentleman has expressed here. I understand the Attorney General of the United States has construed the law as meaning that the term of enlistment shall be taken as the basis, instead of the term of service actually rendered. Now, I desire to have the law so amended that it shall be so explicit that it will not admit of such a construction as that which I understand the Attorney General to have given.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the very section before his eyes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] can see these words: "during the present rebellion for any period of service of not less than three months."

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the language of the old law, which has been construed, as I have said, by the Attorney General. It can do no harm to make the law explicit.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] if the purpose of his amendment is to have a three years' man count no more than a one year's man.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose to have him count for three times as much, for the actual service he has rendered. If he has served three years, then he will count as much as three one year's men.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose he has served but one year?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then there will be a credit for one year's service.

Mr. THAYER. Suppose he has been killed?

Mr. INGERSOLL. He cannot serve after he is dead.

Mr. THAYER. If he enlisted for three years, and has fallen in battle, he should be credited as a three years' man.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move pro forma to strike out the last words of the amendment. It strikes me that the amendment is proper and just. I am opposed to the calculation of credits based upon a service to be rendered two or three years hence, unless this Government will satisfy me that the war is to last so long, and the parties are to render that service. I am opposed to the calculation upon which the present draft has been ordered, for the reason that I say it is unjust to give credit to a locality for a man who has merely promised to render service two years hence. Upon the present calculation of Provost Marshal General Fry, a man who entered the service yesterday for three years is to be counted as three men who have served one whole year each; thus putting their actual service in the field against the promises of men who may run away to-morrow. I am opposed to that basis of calculation.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I doubt whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will accomplish the object he has in view. In all future computations he says that the period of service shall be considered. If he means the period of enlistment then I see how it can be arrived at; but it will require in the case of every one wounded, every one killed, every one dismissed, and every one discharged, that you shall find the exact number of days in order to enter into a computation. The thing is impracticable. It would take about a year to make the calculation in reference to any sub-district draft from the Adjutant General's Office.

I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that his amendment probably does not indicate what he really intends. If that is what he wants I must vote against the amendment, no matter what principle is involved.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITHERS. I move to insert the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the provost marshal in each enrollment district to cause copies of the enrollment of each ward, township, election precinct, or other sub-district thereof, to be posted in at least three public places therein for thirty days before the time fixed for any draft; and thereupon it shall be the duty of every person whose name is not on the list posted in the ward, township, election precinct, or other sub-district in which he resides and who is liable to enrollment therein, under the provisions of the several acts to which this is an amendment, to report himself, in person or by writing, for enrollment to the enrolling board of the district where he resides; and any such person who, for twenty days after the posting of such lists, shall willfully neglect to report for enrollment, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon indictment and conviction thereof by any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall pay a fine of $100, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned for thirty days. It shall be the duty of the provost marshal of the district to report such cases of delinquency to the district attorney of the United States for the judicial district in which the delinquent is liable to enrollment.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment is offered with the concurrence of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is to carry out what I presume they intended by the first section. This, I think, is in a more acceptable form. My objection to the first section was that it compelled every person to report to the enrolling officer under rigid rules; and in the second place it directed that no notice should be given to the persons not enrolled. This provides that the provost marshal shall, thirty days before the time fixed for the draft, post in three public places lists of those enrolled, so as to give notice to persons in the enrollment districts whether they are or are not enrolled, and that then, on such publication, it shall be the duty of every person not enrolled to report in person, and in case of willful neglect to do so within twenty days, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. It seems to me that this protects the citizens on the one hand, while on the other hand it protects the Government.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to oppose the amendment. It contains the very principle which has been already emphatically condemned by the House—a principle which I undertake to say would be more obnoxious to the people of this country than any provision contained in the enrollment law.

Sir, there are many things a man will submit to be done to him which he does not like to do to himself. I cannot conceive of any proposition which would be more unpopular or dissatisfactory, or which would make the present enrollment law more distasteful to the people, than that principle which this House has already condemned, and which the committee sought to incorporate into the law, namely, the principle that every man shall be compelled to go to the enrolling officer and report himself as liable to enrollment. I see no material difference between what was proposed by the Military Committee and what is now proposed by the gentleman from Delaware. It simply postpones the duty, which by the section as originally reported was imposed upon the party, to a later period of time. The principle itself is there; the very principle which this House condemned, and which only postpones the obligation which was sought to be imposed until after the enrolling officer shall have made this publication.

There is no public necessity which requires us to ingraft upon this law any feature which will make it more offensive to the people than it is already. It is at all events and under any circumstances a bitter law, a law which nothing but the exigency of public affairs would sanction.

Let us not push the provisions of that law one jot further than the necessities of the case require. Let us strive to soften, if it be possible, its features so long as we may preserve its efficiency. I believe that no public necessity exists for the addition to that feature which is now proposed. I know of no district in which any considerable numbers of people have escaped the vigilant eyes of the enrolling officer. I have heard of no district in which any such complaints exist. These officers have discharged their duties everywhere, so far as I know or have been able to learn, with great thoroughness and great fidelity. There has been no complaint I ever heard of that these officers have passed over those who are liable to military service; and there is therefore no necessity for that stringent feature which is now attempted to be ingrafted on this law, and which will make it odious in the eyes of the people.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "thirty" and inserting "twenty-nine." I move the amendment for the purpose of enabling me to correct a wrong impression which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] evidently labors under. Now, sir, it is well known to every gentleman in this House that there are persons who attempt to evade the draft. There are persons in almost every election precinct in every loyal State of the Union who by every dishonorable means endeavor to evade it. That they do evade it is a matter of fact and of history; and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware seeks to remedy this evil, but in some legitimate and fair manner. If it is made the duty of the provost marshal to place the lists of each sub-district, township, and election precinct where the parties interested can have an opportunity to examine them, they can learn whether their names are on the lists; and if they are honest men, and their names are not on the lists, they will report themselves to the provost marshal. And now objection to that is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and with worse grace than from almost any other State. No voter in the State of Pennsylvania can exercise the elective franchise unless his name be on a list furnished by the commissioner of the county a certain number of days before the election.

Mr. THAYER. I have been a voter a great many years in Pennsylvania, and I know of no law which declares that a man shall not vote whose name is not upon such a list. On the contrary, the daily practice is for persons to vote whose names are not on the list, provided they have the proof that they possess the necessary qualifications.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman had heard me through he would have ascertained that I know something of the laws of Pennsylvania, and that I would do neither him nor his State any injustice. I have no intention of disparaging the gentleman or his State; but I merely wished to state that the same rules prevail there in relation to the elective franchise, as nearly as they can be made to apply, as are sought to be applied to the draft by the gentleman from Delaware. If the voter's name is not returned by the county commissioner a certain number of days before election, it is made the duty of the elector to place his name upon the list, and if he fails to do that he cannot vote.

Mr. THAYER. There is no such law in Pennsylvania.

Mr. PRICE. He cannot vote at the election unless he proves his residence in the district by a resident of the district. Such was the law in Pennsylvania when I lived and voted there, and I think it is the law now.

No injustice will be done to any class by this amendment. If a man does not wish to avoid the draft, and he is an honest and honorable citizen, if he finds that his name is not upon the list of persons subject to draft, he will have it placed there. But if he willfully and deliberately attempts to defraud the Government of the proper use of his name, a penalty should be inflicted upon him for the purpose of protecting honest and honorable men who have their names upon the lists. It is the intention of the amendment to protect the honorable, the fair-minded, and the patriotic citizens of the country, against the dishonorable, the unpatriotic, and the traitorous members of the country.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman suppose that the names are put upon the list by the citizens themselves? Are they not enrolled in the ordinary way?

Mr. PRICE. By the amendment it is made the duty of every man who, upon examining the lists, finds his name is not there, to go and make return of it to the provost marshal. If he does not do that, the penalty of the law should be inflicted upon him.

This is no mere theory, sir. It is a matter of fact and history. The experience of the last four years has proved, to demonstration, that there are men who shirk the draft, and by every means in their power seek to evade it, making the loyal and patriotic part of the community bear the burden which they themselves should share. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware will prevail, and that this burden will fall alike on all men, whether they are willing to bear it or not. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to close debate on the section and on all amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITHERS'S amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out the words "and whose father is subject to enrollment and draft;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth who has resided in the United States for three years preceding his arriving at the age of twenty-one years, shall be exempt from enrollment and draft on account of being an alien, but shall be subject thereto.

In offering this amendment, Mr. Speaker, I am enabled to explain the object of this section, and at the same time to show that the amendment which I propose is consistent with that object. By the present enrollment law all persons who have declared their intention to become citizens are made liable to enrollment and draft. They are considered as owing allegiance to the Government. They are considered as coming under the principle of that decision which made the difficulty in the Koszta case—as having so far broken off their character of aliens and come within the character of American citizens as to be liable to be called for to assist in defending the country. That principle being settled by the statute covering the subject of enrollment and draft, it is proposed now by the amendment to extend it to a class of persons who stand in precisely the same relation to the Government. A minor who has been in the country for three years next before arriving at the age of twenty-one is held to occupy the same relation to the Government on the question of citizenship as the foreigner who has declared his intention to become a citizen, for after two years more he can become naturalized without any previous declaration of intention. It is proposed, therefore, that while you make liable to enrollment and draft those aliens who have declared their intention, you shall extend the same rule to those who, having resided here three years before attaining the age of twenty-one years, have done that which is equivalent to a declaration of intention. It is an amendment which will greatly benefit the State of Wisconsin and several other of the northwestern States, by bringing a class of persons within the enrollment act who now evade the draft, while enjoying all the privileges of citizenship, even to voting, in those States.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Can you compel an alien who has lived here three years to serve in the Army?

Mr. SCHENCK. We are doing it now.

Mr. KERNAN. I have seen instances where such persons have been discharged by the courts. What is the practice?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will recollect the angry correspondence that took place with the Government of Austria in reference to the Koszta case. He had declared his intention, and it was held to be consistent with international law that we should treat, as entitled to all the protection of citizens, those who had declared their intention to become citizens. That being the case, the Government has gone further, and has already extended to that class of people the obligation of serving in the Army. This amendment is carrying out the principle. I do not say that I ever agreed to the principle originally.

Mr. KERNAN. There is this difference in the two cases, that where the one has signified his intention to become a citizen, the other may have had no such desire.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman means to put his objection on the ground that, being minors, such persons are incapable of declaring their intentions on any subject.

Mr. KERNAN. No, no; I do not.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman does not make that technical objection, then I hold that they come within the scope of the laws of the United States, which treat them as doing that which is equivalent to declaring their intention to become citizens, if they are here for the three years next preceding the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. KERNAN. A man who declares his intention to become a citizen, as soon as he can do so under the law, has elected to throw off all allegiance to his former Government and to become a citizen of our country. But a man who comes here and lives three years, and has never signified any intention to throw off his former allegiance and become a subject of our Government, is in a very different condition.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman does not understand my proposition. This bill does not propose to hold every man subject to draft who has been here three years as an alien, but only those who have resided here for three years next preceding becoming twenty-one years of age; which, by our law, is held to be equivalent to a declaration of intention to become a citizen of this country.

Mr. KERNAN. Suppose the father comes here and the son lives with him for three years before he is twenty-one; the son may not wish to become a citizen and does not intend to throw off his allegiance to the Government of the country in which he was born. Can we justly compel that son to serve in our military service the same as though he had declared his intention to become a citizen?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. The argument in favor of holding a man liable to draft because he has been in this country for three years prior to his becoming twenty-one years of age seems to me to be very unreasonable. Why not hold a man liable who has been in the country for three years after he was twenty-one years of age? Why seize upon the party who has been in the country contrary to his own will, and because his father brought him here, and make him liable to the draft? Why take a man who has done no act and taken no step to throw off his allegiance to his native country and to take upon himself allegiance to this as his adopted country? It makes responsible and liable to draft a party who has no will of his own, one who was under twenty-one years of age when brought into this country, merely because he has lived here three years before he arrived at the age of twenty-one years. And if you do that, why not extend the provision to the man who, without declaring his intentions, has been in this country for three years after he was twenty-one years of age? If you can do the one rightfully you can just as well do the other.

This proposition is based upon the fact that a man who has been in the country for three years before he is twenty-one years of age, is permitted, under our present statutes, when he has remained here two years after he has become twenty-one years old, to go into court, declare his intention to become a citizen, and at once become naturalized and be made a citizen of the United States. But even he must have been here five years altogether before he makes his declaration of intention and becomes a citizen. This proposes to hold the party as doing an act, when in contemplation of law he is unable and has not the will to do it. It would be operating manifest injustice upon the class of persons whom it is thus proposed to make subject to a draft.

And more than that, it would be going beyond our power, and would most probably involve us in difficulties with foreign Powers. We have no right to seize upon foreigners, whether minors or adults, whether under the age of twenty-one years or above it, unless they have in some way signified their intention to throw off their allegiance to their native country, and to take upon themselves the obligations of allegiance to this Government. The mere lapse of time cannot raise a presumption as to what a man intends to do in regard to his citizenship. The statute as it stands merely extends to parties a privilege of which they may avail themselves if they see proper to do so. We have no right, because the statute has extended this privilege to them, to assume that it is made compulsory upon them to assume the obligations of citizenship.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last words "and draft."

Mr. SCHENCK. I raise a point of order. I have moved to strike out certain words in this section. Is it in order to move as an amendment to my motion, to strike out a portion only of what I propose to strike out?

The SPEAKER. It is in the nature of an amendment to an amendment, and is in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. I will only say that I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] has already made six ten-minute speeches, and he only threatened us with an hour's speech at first.

Mr. CHANLER. That is but another specimen of the small bullying which is characteristic of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] This effort on the part of that gentleman to cramp debate is evidently merely for the purpose of gratifying his own peculiar way of wriggling out of a difficulty, and shows remarkable ingenuity, perhaps, but very little moral courage.

This section is, probably, beyond all others, the most positive proof of the utter failure of this system as a means of enrolling and calling out the armies of the United States. Is there anything that could show a stronger conviction of the utter unwillingness of the American citizen to fight for the institutions of his country and to die for the cause in which he has so often and so well fought, as to go forth throughout the length and breadth of the land to capture minors who are not yet citizens, not yet entitled, under the law of this country, to bear the burdens and discharge the duties of citizenship; men who, as has been shown by my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON,] owe allegiance elsewhere? By the system which you have inaugurated, you have, under the plea of "necessity," exhausted all the elements which should form a strong and patriotic Army. You have sought the slave as a substitute for the soldier. By degrading the position of the soldier you have failed to fill the armies by enlisting the citizens of the country. And it is now proposed to seize upon those who, from political necessity or the spirit of enterprise, have come from foreign lands to seek the shelter of our flag and Constitution, embracing the invitation which we ourselves have extended. This is a most effective way of writing down the American citizen as afraid to meet the dangers which surround his country at this epoch.

Let this Government rely upon the constitutional provisions for the raising of our armies and the calling out of the citizens by the States, and we shall need no such provisions as these. Let the Government rely upon the spirit of the people; let it rely upon the volunteers of the country. We have relied upon them heretofore. The armies in the field to-day embrace many veterans who rushed to the front to serve the country. The heroes of General Sherman's army are not the conscripts; they are not the emancipated slaves; they are not the aliens, whom gentlemen would hereafter draft to form into an army for the carrying out of tyrannical purposes. No, sir, the victories won at the South are won by American citizens who have voluntarily, from motives of patriotism, gone into the service. They are not hirelings from every quarter of the globe, brought here by the captivating bounties which this system of draft has caused to be offered. They are not the miserable wretches who, having fled from slavery, have found a refuge beneath the flag of the United States because they wear the uniform of soldiers. No, sir, they are the men who have remained in the field, and, spite of trials and discomforts, have fought their way through to victory. They demand from us proper companions in the conflict. They demand from us a proper estimate of their services and their virtues. Let us no longer depreciate the American soldier to that contemptible standard to which all systems like the draft must reduce him. The Constitution of our country, the character of our people, the whole tenor of our institutions are in favor of that system by which the citizen brings his free-will offerings to the temple of liberty. Yet gentlemen in this House seek to pervert that principle and set at naught the Constitution by advocating measures like this.

Sir, the military necessity under which this system of draft began has ceased; but the necessities of trade still exist. Stop the trade of your generals in the field in cotton; prevent them from falling victims to the sweet influence of sugar; stop their yearnings to finger the glittering metal as it gleams upon them through the open door of a fire-proof safe; teach them that to covet is crime. Sir, rely upon the people. Rely upon the military character which they have shown in the past. You cannot get by importation better soldiers than the natives of your own soil. Do not go begging from country to country to fill up the ranks of American armies. Do not rely upon the "American citizen of African descent;" but rely upon the white citizen, the man whose hopes and aspirations are all wrapped up in the liberty and glory of his country and the maintenance of his flag.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to move to strike out the section?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be reserved till the amendments designed to perfect the section have been acted upon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to close debate upon the section and pending amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to. Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by inserting before the word "preceding," in the third line, the word "next."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, to strike out the section.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 81, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Elderton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, William H. Miller, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jencks, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perlman, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upton, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Dixon, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, James R. Morris, Odell, Patterson, Pendleton, Pike, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Shannon, Spalding, William G. Steele, Sweat, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—51.

So the House refused to strike out the section.

The third section was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter, in every case of actual desertion by a substitute, if such person so deserting shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person liable to draft and not actually drafted, the name of such person so liable to draft, and who furnished such substitute, shall be again placed upon the list, and he shall be liable to be drafted for the unexpired term of service of such substitute so deserting. And if such substitute, so deserting, shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person actually drafted, then the Provost Marshal General shall direct the provost marshal of the proper district immediately to notify the person who furnished such substitute that he is held to service in the place of such substitute for the unexpired term of his service, and he shall stand in the same relation and be subject to the same liability that he was after he was drafted and before he furnished such substitute. And it is hereafter made the duty of the Provost Marshal General to cause to be charged to the several wards, townships, precincts, or other enrollment sub-districts, and added to their several quotas, the number of desertions of persons who have been furnished by such wards, townships, precincts, or other sub-districts, in the filling of their several quotas of troops. But nothing in this section shall be construed to relieve any soldier guilty of desertion from trial, conviction, or punishment for his crime: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the person, district, or corporation that shall have put in such substitute, to arrest the deserter, or cause him to be arrested and returned to his proper company, or to some officer designated by the Provost Marshal General, without cost to the Government; and upon his being so returned to service, and remaining therein until the expiration of his term, the principal shall be relieved from other liability for his service.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what necessity of the military service requires the insertion of this section?

I desire to look at the equity of the section. Let me suppose a case. Suppose I am drafted, and in good faith, in the interest of the Government, furnish a substitute for which I have either to pay money or involve myself in debt. Of course the Government takes charge of that substitute—I have by no possibility any charge of his person; and yet if he is induced to desert, by no fault of mine, the Government comes back on me. Then I will have to go in his place although I have had no charge of the substitute and no control over him from the moment that he was accepted and mustered into the service of the United States.

I should like to know, sir, from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the reasons which induced them to incorporate that provision into this bill. You might as well ask me to hunt a thief and become a detective as to do this thing; to make me responsible for the substitute after he has been mustered in. I think that it is so plain a case that even the chairman, with his military experience, will hardly claim that it ought to pass.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, in opposing the amendment I shall be able to answer the question why such a section was deemed necessary by the Military Committee. There is certainly misapprehension on the part of gentlemen in this Hall on both sides in reference to the relation which the members of the Military Committee bear to this subject of raising armies by enrollment and draft. Gentlemen on the one side and the other seem occasionally to feel themselves called upon not only to suppose, but to express the opinion that there is a disposition on the part of the committee to tyrannize over the people of this country, to make harsh laws. It may be considered that we of the committee stand here the Representatives of the people, for the people, and of the people, as much as other gentlemen in the House.

What are the provisions that we have inserted in this bill? The conclusion in reference to the provisions submitted on the part of the committee has been reached after such investigation as we could give, deriving information on the several points involved from whatever legitimate and authentic source we could. We have framed this bill, and the various sections of it, after consultation with the authorities here, with the Provost Marshal General and the head of the War Department, after consultation and correspondence with enrolling officers all over the land, after looking into correspondence which we have had with Governors of States, after looking into innumerable communications made to us by members themselves, and communications coming from citizens throughout the country; and we have endeavored from this information, derived from all sources, to ascertain what were the defects of the present law and what would be the best remedy for them. Among these defects is one which arises from the present loose method of permitting substitutes to be put in. I do not know whether I will have time to have read some extracts from the report of General Hinks, who has had charge of the rendezvous camp at New York; but I know that it would be profitable information to this House. He shows what has been his experience and observation at that rendezvous camp for recruits and substitutes at New York. It is a paper which has been ably prepared. It presents the whole subject fully. It shows how it is that our best regiments in the Army have been running down under the present substitute system.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the whole of it read?

Mr. SCHENCK. No; only the parts I have marked. But I want first to respond to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will illustrate one of the best regiments in the service, made up of men entirely from one of the States, when thinned by battle and disease was, under the substitute system, filled up with substitutes from Canada and everywhere else, and now, by desertions of these substitutes to the enemy and elsewhere, it stands as one of the most inefficient. And the history of that regiment is but the history of a great many regiments that have been filled up by the class of persons obtained by substitution all over the land, with little or no reference upon the part of those obtaining the substitute, and no care upon the part of the substitute broker, to the character and good promise of the individuals thus put in.

One word now in regard to the principle involved in this whole thing. I look at it from a stand-point different from that which many gentlemen take, when they say the Government enters into a contract with the man who furnishes the substitute that when he has furnished the substitute the contract is executed upon his part; and he must be released forever thereafter. I deny all that. I say that every individual, instead of making a contract, is but discharging a duty; one imposed on him and on all other citizens liable to military service. I hold that every man, at least within the proper age, owes personal military service to the Government in its time of trial and trouble, in order to protect and preserve it; and that when called upon to yield that service, under the forms of law, the Government deals with him liberally when it says, "You are bound to serve one year, for instance, unless by the act of God prevented; but we agree that you may do that service by another. But the service we must have; and you may give it by yourself or by proxy; but you must be answerable for your proxy; not if he dies, not if he is sick, not if he becomes disabled in the service; but you shall not plead his crime—for desertion is a crime—any more than you could by your own ill deserts get rid of giving this year's service."

The mistake of gentlemen consists in treating this as a matter of contract. It is a matter of personal obligation resting upon every man when called upon to help and defend the Government, to give his time and service to that end; and it is a matter of liberality upon the part of the Government to say he may do it by another; but the Government ought not to go so far as to say he need not do it at all if he who is substituted fails to yield this service. The Government should say that the principal shall be held responsible for the agent, and that he or his agent shall perform the service.

I know a plausible argument may be drawn from this: that when the substitute is turned over to the Government, and comes under the charge of the military authorities, he may desert because he is badly treated, or from laxity of discipline, and that the fault is with the Government and not with the individual who furnishes the substitute. I answer that by saying that you shall not be permitted to plead the crime of this desertion of your substitute as a ground of release. If there be laxity of discipline, or severity of discipline, or other fault on the part of the Government authorities in carrying out the military laws, that cannot excuse a party for committing the crime of desertion either by himself or his representative.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend this section by striking out the following:

That hereafter, in every case of actual desertion by a substitute, if such person so deserting shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person liable to draft and not actually drafted, the name of such person so liable to draft, and who furnished such substitute, shall be again placed upon the list, and he shall be liable to be drafted for the unexpired term of service of such substitute so deserting.

I move this amendment in order to express my views with reference to this provision. It will not be contended that this law, or any other conscript law that we can have in a republican Government, is not repugnant to the feelings of our people; and this feature ingrafted upon this bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, in my judgment, is the most repugnant provision that has been submitted to the House or country. I am not at all astonished that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should insist upon this provision, for time and again has he announced to this House that in his opinion the substitute clause ought to have been stricken out of all bills for conscription. Congress, however, has seen fit to adopt a different policy, and the House time and again has expressed its views upon this question; and now, near the close of the session, when a heavy call for men is pending, the Military Committee, through its chairman, presents this bill with a provision in it not only making every man responsible for his own sins against the Government, but responsible for other people's sins. Such a provision in a law of this kind cannot be found upon the statute-books of any country. It is unjust and wrong, and cannot be defended upon the theory of the gentleman from Ohio that every man owes service to his Government. I admit that every man owes allegiance and service to the Government of the country. But where the legislation of the country prescribes how he may discharge that allegiance and service I insist that it would be a violent wrong to make him responsible after he has complied with the law and furnished his substitute.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that in many instances parties have been put in as substitutes who have deserted from the service. But is that any reason why you should compel those who have furnished substitutes to become personally responsible for the failure of their substitutes to perform their duties as required by the regulations of the War Department and by the law of the land? We had better at once strike out of the conscription law every provision looking to the employment of substitutes, than adopt this section. It may be that men do desert. Doubtless there are thousands of instances in which they have deserted. But that is not the fault of the citizens who employ them and put them into the service. They are not in default. They have complied with the provisions of law. They have done what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] or any other member of the House would do—discharge faithfully every obligation and duty which he owes to the Government by complying with the law. After the substitute has passed beyond the control of the principal, after he has put himself under the command, direction, and supervision of the military officers, should we still exact another important obligation from him, that is, to make him responsible for the good conduct of the substitute?

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio can maintain that principle he may as well go a step further and insist that there shall be inserted in these conscription laws a provision making the principal responsible for the substitute not only in case of desertion, but also in case of cowardice in battle. In my view open cowardice on the field of battle is as great a crime as desertion; and if the principal be held responsible for his substitute in the one case, he should be so held in the other case also.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman from Ohio had sought to make his bill odious in the last degree to the people he could not have done so better than by embodying in it this provision. I am in favor of filling up the ranks of the Army, and I repeat a sentiment that I uttered a moment ago on another question—that I am proud of belonging to a State that has not had to resort, in any considerable measure, to conscription laws to fill up its quotas of men required for the defense of the Government. I may be permitted to say further, that if we had pursued a different policy, and relied upon the patriotism of the people to defend the country, I believe we could have prosecuted this war with more success than it has been prosecuted under the pet scheme of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] of forcing men into our armies. I do not believe in resorting to these extreme methods of filling our armies. The law has too many odious features in it already to meet my approbation. I do not intend that the people whom I represent shall be insulted in this way. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out all in the section after the words "be enacted" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That whenever, under the provisions of this or any previous act for the enrollment and calling out of the national forces, a substitute has been or shall be accepted and mustered into the service, the person furnishing such substitute shall be exempted from draft and from the performance of all duty for which such person was or shall be liable to draft, for the period for which such person was liable to draft, or for which such substitute was not liable to draft. Such acceptance and mustering in of the substitute shall be conclusive in favor of the principal.

I do not think it worth while to say much about this, because I do not believe anybody is in favor of this section except my gallant friend, the chairman of the Military Committee. If he had made it consistent by putting in it that when the substitute deserted the principal should be shot, or if the substitute committed larceny the principal should be sent to the penitentiary, then the section might have had more of vigor in it than it now presents.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yield to me a moment to offer an amendment which I think will be found in accordance with the suggestion he has made?

Mr. STEVENS. I have but a few words to say; I will be through in a moment, and then the gentleman will have an opportunity to offer his amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It seems to me that this is the proper place for it. I do not wish to say anything; merely to offer the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; I will yield a moment for that purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to add the following to the section:

Every person furnishing a substitute shall be answerable for his conduct; if the substitute deserts, the principal shall be shot; if the substitute runs away in battle, the principal shall be imprisoned at hard labor during the war, at the Dry Tortugas; if the substitute robs a hen-roost, the principal shall carry a rail on his shoulder for two hours.

Mr. STEVENS. I have to say in regard to that amendment, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] has made a very creditable attempt to carry out the line of my argument.

The substitute which I have offered in place of this section I suppose is what the present law was meant to be. But the Department does not so construe the law. Last week I received a letter from a highly respectable person in my district, in which he stated that some months ago he furnished a substitute for three years, who was examined, accepted, and mustered in the service. About a month ago it was found that the substitute was subject to epileptic fits, and the principal was called upon to furnish another man in his place, although the Government after due examination had accepted the man he first offered. I therefore think the proposition I have submitted is absolutely necessary; although I should not have thought so if I had not heard of the decision made upon this subject. However, I do not wish to take up the time of the House upon this subject, and therefore will say no more upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Before the vote is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] I move to add to his substitute the following:

And in all cases where heretofore persons drawn under supplementary drafts to fill quotas shall have furnished their principals, and both are held in actual service, those drawn as supplemental shall be discharged from such service.

The supposable cases which have been stated to the House as cases which would probably arise under the law under consideration, have created some merriment because of their ridiculous character. The gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. SCHENCK,] remarked that from his stand-point he did not see the law in the light in which some gentlemen seem to see it. I have no doubt that such is the fact. Under the administration of the law as it now exists, so much is left to the discretion of the district provost marshals, as well as to the Provost Marshal General, that the operation of the law is felt to be very materially different in different sections of the country.

My amendment proposes simply that where a man has been drawn in a sub-district as supplemental to fill the place of one who was drawn before but did not report, and both are now in the service, the man who was drawn as supplemental shall be discharged. I would laugh at the idea of offering such an amendment as this, if I did not know that it was necessary. I know of two cases in my district where a supplemental draft was had to fill the place of one who had been drafted before but did not report. When the party heard that his name was drawn at this supplemental draft he started off and on his own responsibility caught the delinquent and took him to the office of the provost marshal. The provost marshal ordered the uniform to be put upon both of them, and they are both to-day in service at the front. I know of two cases like that which occurred in my own district. They have applied for redress; I do not know what course their applications have taken; probably pitched away one side in the Department, and in the multiplicity of business pressing upon the officers in that Department they have not been able to get a hearing.

Now this does seem to be most monstrous injustice. In the first place, it is unjust, simply because a party is delinquent, that a draft be made upon a district and the neighbor taken while the delinquent is allowed to go. But it is still worse where the party drafted at the supplemental draft comes forward, catches the man whose place he was drawn to fill, and takes him to the office of the provost marshal, who seizes both and puts them both in the service. It is, however, in harmony with the spirit of this section; and therefore my amendment, ridiculous as it may seem upon its face, becomes absolutely necessary and is germane.

I will not undertake to discuss the proposition of the section under consideration. It seems to me that the judgment of the House is against it. It is hard to tell, however, what this House is going to do. I have been surprised at some of its votes, as I would be surprised if it should fail to strike out this section. I have, therefore, felt it my duty to offer this amendment now, so as to perfect the bill as far as possible in the event that the section shall not be stricken out.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania embraces substantially a section which was proposed at the last session of Congress, and which was voted down, to the effect that the principal should be exempted from all further draft or call during the time for which his substitute was accepted. The law at present is, as I understand it, that the principal shall be exempted from the impending draft.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is my recollection. At any rate, as the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania emasculates this entire section, changes its whole character, I am opposed to the amendment for the reason that I am in favor of the section.

Mr. STEVENS. The provision of the present law is this:

"If such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It appears, then, that I was a little mistaken as to the provisions of the present law. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was equally mistaken in saying that the law now corresponds with his amendment.

As I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this section. The principle embraced in it is one to the consideration of which I have given a good deal of attention. There is not a soldier to whom I have shown this section, or to whom I have explained it, who has not said that it is right. Nor have I conversed with any loyal, patriotic citizen, since this subject has been under consideration, who has not also said that this section is right—that the principal ought to be responsible for the substitute in case the latter deserts.

My friend from Pennsylvania says that we might with equal propriety require that the principal should be shot in case the substitute deserts, or that if the substitute steals the principal should be punished for the larceny. Now, sir, no burlesquing, no satire, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (and I acknowledge that his satire is very keen,) can convince me, or the country, or the Army, that it is best to go on as we have been doing—putting bounty jumpers into the Army as substitutes, to desert from time to time, leaving their regiments as small as when they went in. Why, sir, if a man employs a substitute to steal, and that substitute does steal, the principal ought to be punished. If he employs a substitute to serve the Government in his stead for three years, and the substitute serves but six months, the principal ought to be required to serve in person or by substitute for the remainder of the term.

This section will operate prospectively; it will not operate retrospectively. If it should be adopted every man who may furnish a substitute hereafter will do so with his eyes open, knowing what the law is. The law will become a part of the contract under which he puts his substitute into the Army.

The principal owes, we will say, three years' service to the Government. That is a debt; it is an obligation resting upon him which he ought to discharge, and discharge faithfully and honestly. The Government says to him, "If it is not convenient for you to go, you may send in your place a man who is not liable to the draft." He puts a man into the service for three years as his agent, as his substitute, and before he gets to the Army that substitute jumps from the cars and deserts. Now, I ask any fair man whether it not proper and just to require that the principal shall serve out the time for which he put in that substitute?

I am in favor of this clause for another reason—not only because it will fill our armies with good soldiers, but I am in favor of it because it will put an end to bounty jumping and to the vocation of the substitute brokers, who have been a curse to the Army. Adopt this and their vocation is gone. You will have no more substitute brokers. You will have no more men running over to Canada and to the enemy—men who came as substitutes originally from Canada. I recollect the case of a gallant regiment—as fine a regiment as I ever saw put into the service, stalwart, patriotic men—that was reduced by battle and exposure in the field, and some three or four hundred substitutes were put into it in order to fill it up, and in the course of a few weeks they disgraced the regiment, some running off to the enemy. Some of the substitutes actually were men who had left the seceding States, gone to Canada, come over the lines, and been hired as substitutes; and when they were put into the Army they went over to the enemy with their greenbacks in their pockets.

Adopt this section and you put an end to this at once. A man puts his substitute into the Army knowing what the law is. He knows if his substitute is not a good man, and if he has not engaged to serve in good faith, that in case of his desertion he will have to take his place or furnish another substitute.

I have never heard a loyal citizen who complained of this; and you will not find a faithful soldier in the Army who will not tell you that this is proper and just. Substitute brokers and substitutes have been the curse of the Army. Regiments have been filled up by these men, and they fondly hoped they would continue to win laurels as they had done before, but instead they found themselves reduced to a low standard by desertions.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague on the Military Committee has opposed the amendment, and I propose to oppose the amendment to the amendment. I want to have read, as a portion of my speech, some extracts for the information of the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"DRAFTED SOLDIERS, QUOTAS, FRAUDS, AND DESERTIONS.—Brigadier General Edward W. Hinks, now in command of the draft rendezvous at Hart island, New York harbor, has addressed a letter to the Adjutant General of the United States on the subject of the frauds committed upon the Government, the Army, and the country, by the enlistment of persons totally unfit for service—the enlistment of deserters and criminals, and by desertions, which evils have so increased in magnitude as to demand the serious attention of those who are vested with the power, and whose duty it is to preserve the armies from depletion and disgrace, and the people from utter demoralization. General Hinks says:

"Whole communities are exerting themselves, and contending with others to their utmost capacity, and lavishing their wealth in unstinted measure, to secure the filling of quotas with men whom they can obtain by any means of bargain, deception, or fraud, with which to liquidate upon paper their old obligations to the Government, regardless alike as to whether the men so obtained are fit for soldiers, or whether they contribute to the increase of our armies or those of the enemy, so long as the quota of the district is filled and themselves exempted from the draft.

"The people being but too willing to evade the service due from themselves to the country, at any cost of money or sacrifice of principle, and ever ready to avail themselves of defects in the laws to satisfy their own moral obligations to contribute to the increase of the Army and the actual support of the Government, have delegated the duties of filling quotas and obtaining substitutes to brokers and others, usually the vilest men of the community, who are governed by no principle, and frequently collude with the recruit himself to perpetrate the intended fraud, to prevent the consummation of which the community at large interpose no objection, because it would render the filling of quotas more difficult, and hence the result.

"Felony is compounded and crime pardoned by magistrates, that criminals may be sent into the Army to stain its fair name, imperil its success, and dishonor its faithful soldiers, or desert its banners to join the enemy, enlist again in some other locality, consummating a double fraud—all to fill the quotas.

"Drunkards, useless for any purposes of life, are suborned to defraud the Government and country, by enlisting as soldiers—to fill the quotas.

Rebel spies, refugees, and fugitives from justice are assisted to enlist in our armies, from which they pass with well-filled pockets directly into the confederacy—but it fills the quotas.

"Imbeciles and lunatics are enjoined to enlist, and defrauded of their bounty by designing knaves, but no one appears to object—for it fills the quotas.

"Men are coerced up, drugged, or stupefied with intoxicating liquors, and coerced to enlist under assumed names, which oftentimes they themselves are unable to remember, and no one detects the fraud until they become sobered at the general rendezvous, because every one is entirely engrossed—in filling the quotas.

"Soldiers from our own armies are assisted, if not per-sueded, to desert, and are concealed until they can be conducted to some remote locality to enlist again, by the extensive combination of runners and brokers whose connections ramify the whole country to such an extent that a regular system is created of depleting our armies—to fill the quotas.

"Boys, whose immaturity, and old men whose senility unfit them for all the duties of a soldier; cripples and invalids, unable to perform the slightest degree of manual labor, are openly persuaded or deceived into enlisting, by representing to them that they can be credited to a sub-district, get the local bounty, and will be rejected when they arrive at the general rendezvous; and in many cases the town or county agent, broker, runner, and recruit combine in the employment of every artifice to conceal the defects and incapacity of the recruit before enlistment; and after the credit has been obtained, and the bounty divided, assist him to magnify his disabilities and wrongs, that he may be discharged, and they permitted to use him again—to fill the quotas."

"General Hinks says his experience in the general rendezvous and the field has convinced him that fully three-fourths of all the enormous contributions of States, counties, and towns for local bounties, &c., goes directly into the hands of the agent, broker, middle-man, runner, or deserter, and not more than one-fourth is ever received by soldiers who render bona fide service in the armies of the nation; and from practical tests in the localities where he has had experience, it is evident that scarcely more than fifty per cent. of the number of recruits credited to districts become effective soldiers in the Army. He adds that the suspicion and proper restraint put on recruits of the common class, and the humiliation and confinement of necessity imposed upon all who enter the service, because of the difficulty of distinguishing the honest soldier from the dishonest, and the gathering of criminals and drunkards into the ranks, has already wrought its deleterious results upon our service by preventing our young men of pride, ambition and character, of which the Army has been and always ought to be composed, from entering its ranks in company with disreputable characters, and voluntarily subjecting themselves to the humiliating process and mortifying restraints now required.

"General Hinks proposes the following remedial system: "To remedy this enormous and increasing evil, no severity of punishment of delinquents, no rigor of administration of the laws, no strictness of enforcement of rules by enlisting, mustering, and forwarding officers, is adequate. The evil is of too great a magnitude to be pruned; it lies in the system, which can only be improved by the adoption of such measures as shall secure the interest, the pecuniary and personal interest, of the people in obtaining recruits for the Army, rather than to fill quotas merely.

"Whenever a recruit is discharged for disability existing before enlistment, or shall desert the service, or shall prove to be a deserter from the service, the term of service yet due from such recruit should be added to the amount of service due from the district to which he was credited, and to be filled up by draft, and if such recruit be a substitute, his principal should be held for the term of service yet due from such discharged or deserted recruit.

"If this rule could be adopted the whole system of brokerage and fraud would be at once broken up. The drafted man would make certain of the character and honesty of his substitute before he enlisted him, and hence would do his business himself, and secure some worthy person whom he knew, rather than purchase a stranger of some knave, without seeing him and without knowing or caring whether he was fit for a soldier or not, as at present. Town and country authorities would labor to induce their own trustworthy citizens to enlist and receive their munificent bounties, rather than flock, as they do at present, to the metropolis to purchase a sufficient number of worthless men to fill the quotas, from the brokers and runners whose facilities for inducing men to desert, obtaining deserters, criminals, and rebels are the greatest.

"By the adoption of this rule every person in the community would become directly or indirectly interested in detecting deserters and bringing them to justice. Criminals would no longer be in demand for recruits, and the young men of the land would no longer feel it a personal degradation to enter the ranks of the Army, whose morale and character would be restored and improved, and a stronger and better reinforcement of our victorious armies in the field would soon be obtained from the best blood of the land."

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the whole section be stricken out. I was much surprised at the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that he had never met with one loyal, patriotic man who opposed this section. I profess to be a loyal, patriotic man, and the gentleman from Illinois as well as the chairman of the Military Committee knows that I was opposed to this section in that committee as I now am in the House. So also were some of my colleagues on the committee opposed to it, and I believe a large majority of the members of this House on both sides are as much opposed to it as I am. Now, the law of the land authorizes a party drafted to put a substitute in his place. He has the privilege of doing that under the law. He takes his choice; but the object of this section is to throw upon him not only the responsibility of putting in a substitute, but of following him along for three years; and, if during that time he deserts, the responsibility is thrown back upon the principal, who is to serve the Government during the remainder of the time.

It is a matter of simple justice, and existing law guarantees exemption to a man who puts in a substitute; and this proposed provision is a matter of injustice to the man who shall put a substitute in his stead. Every member of the House knows that when a man is drafted and he furnishes a substitute the Government takes possession of the substitute, who has to be examined under the provisions of existing laws. If he passes, and is accepted, he takes all the responsibility of the drafted man. If he passes the examination of the surgeon and proper officers, he is put into the Army, and the person furnishing such substitute has henceforth no control over him whatever. He is placed in the ranks, when all responsibility ends, as it should, on the part of the man furnishing a substitute in accordance with the laws upon this subject.

It is well known to every man upon this floor that many men have paid their last dollar to put in a substitute in their place, and many have even had to obtain assistance from their friends to aid them in doing so. And now, Mr. Speaker, shall these men have the burden thrown upon them during the whole period of the enlistment of the soldier, causing anxiety and apprehension to the men and their families? that would be intolerable. And through the fault alone of the Government, in the employment of incompetent or dishonest agents, perhaps the substitutes have deserted, such desertion have taken place. I do not believe that the sense of justice of the members upon this floor will for a moment entertain such a proposition as is now before the House. The section is all wrong and should not pass.

I think perhaps all has been said upon both sides of this question that is necessary; and I believe the House is entirely ready for a vote on the question, and I have no doubt what the result of the vote will be.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of their Clerks, announced to the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the bill of the House No. 640, providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled, bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 728) to pay to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension rolls, $300 annually, as a gratuity, in addition to the pension now paid them; and

An act (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Will not the vote be first taken on the motion to strike out after disposing of the amendment to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. There have been different decisions upon the point, but the Chair will hold that the motion to strike out takes precedence of a motion to strike out and insert, for the reason that it does not preclude the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NOBLE. Before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out I desire to perfect the section. I move to amend by striking out of line thirty-two the words "and remaining therein until the expiration of his time."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by adding to the section the words "during the time such substitute shall remain in the service."

Mr. SCHENCK. Upon that I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and STILES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 68.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ODELL. Is it competent for me to withdraw my motion to strike out and allow the question to be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ODELL. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. PRICE. I renew it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 34, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kabbfeisch, Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Loan, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James K. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendlton, Perry, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smithers, John B. Steele, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Towend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ashley, Baxter, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Patterson, Perlman, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Elihu B. Washburne, and Worthington—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Routwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Creswell, Dawes, Harrington, Hotchkiss, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Le Bond, Mallory, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Orth, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, William G. Steele, Sweat, Upton, Voorhees, Ward, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—43.

So the section was stricken out.

Mr. ODELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the section was struck out; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. HIGBY, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, reported that the committee had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate striking out sections five and nine of the bill;

That the Senate recede from its amendment to section five of the bill; and, in lieu thereof, adopt sections six, seven, and eight, of the bill;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate in section six, with an amendment, as follows: Add, at the end of the section, the words "Provided, That said appeals shall be prosecuted and said writs of error sued out at any time before the 1st of January, 1866," and that the Senate concur in that amendment;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to section seven, with an amendment, as follows: After the words "possessory action," in the second line, insert the words "between individuals," and that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sixteenth section of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, is hereby so amended as to allow to the provost marshals appointed under the provisions of that act the same commutation for fuel and quarters as is allowed to other officers ranking as captains of cavalry; but the provost marshal, surgeon, and commissioner constituting the enrolling board, shall not, in any case, be allowed mileage, but only transportation in kind, or the actual cost of their traveling on duty from their respective places of residence to the district headquarters, and returning therefrom, or to and from such other points as they may be by law required to attend at officially within the limits of the district. There shall also be paid by the order of the Secretary of War, on proper vouchers, all actual, necessary, and reasonable expenses of office rent, postage, stationery, and clerk hire.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding as a new section, between sections six and seven, the following:

And be it further enacted, That whenever, under the provisions of this or any previous act for the enrollment and calling out of the national forces, a substitute has been or shall be accepted and mustered into the service, the person furnishing such substitute shall be exempted from draft and from the performance of all duty for which such person was or shall be liable to draft, for the period for which such person was liable to draft or for which such substitute was not liable to draft. Such acceptance and mustering in of the substitute shall be conclusive in favor of the principal.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the law is now according to my amendment; but, as I stated before, the Department has made a construction of it in one or two instances which renders it doubtful—which is that the Government, after having accepted the substitute and after the substitute has gone into the service and served some time, shall, if the substitute be found unfit for the service, be at liberty to call on the principal himself to serve. My amendment is to avoid that construction. It is to provide that after the constituted authorities of the Government have made their examination and accepted the substitute, the principal shall be held to no further responsibility.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I will, in a few brief remarks, assign the objections that I have to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It proposes that the action of the Government in accepting a substitute shall be conclusive upon it. Very often the Government officers are themselves parties to the fraud. The Government ought not to object, therefore, on that ground. But, on the other hand, the Government officers are very often defrauded. Now, suppose a party offers a substitute, knowing that substitute to be insane, as has been done, knowing him to be a convict, knowing him to be a penitentiary bird, knowing him to be subject to epileptic fits, knowing him to be on any other account ineligible for the service, that principal, according to the gentleman's proposition, could march off perfectly triumphant, himself having been the infernal scoundrel who perpetrated the fraud.

And, Mr. Speaker, that is not a supposititious case for which a man has to draw on his imagination. Such cases have actually occurred, and have frequently occurred. There have been cases where persons subject to epileptic fits, and persons escaped from the penitentiary, have been put into the service, the principal knowing the fact. And yet the Government is to be, by the acceptance of such persons, concluded in its rights over the principals.

Mr. KERNAN. This section provides that the provost marshals shall receive "the same commutation for fuel and quarters as is allowed to other officers ranking as captains of cavalry." It also provides that they shall be paid "all actual, necessary, and reasonable expenses of office rent, postage, stationery, and clerk hire." Now, sir, I desire to move to strike out this section. I think that we should not increase the pay of these officers; and if we do increase it, I am opposed to this indefinite sort of increase, which declares that they shall receive "the same commutation for fuel and quarters as is now allowed to other officers ranking as captains of cavalry."

Mr. SCHENCK. These provost marshals now rank by law as captains of cavalry.

Mr. KERNAN. But I do not understand that they are now allowed commutation for fuel and quarters.

Mr. SCHENCK. They are not. But something must be done for these men. They are now very inadequately paid; and inasmuch as they rank by law as captains of cavalry we propose to give them the allowances of that rank.

Mr. KERNAN. There is no difficulty in getting men to fill these offices; there is a great struggle to obtain these positions. But if the pay of these officers is to be increased, I am in favor of doing it in specific terms, by providing, for instance, that they shall receive so much per month.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then you will have to change the whole system.

Mr. KERNAN. These men are not in the Army to such an extent that we might not keep them on a footing which we can understand. I am in favor of striking out the section. I think there is no reason for increasing the pay of these provost marshals.

The section provides also for allowing these officers "all actual, necessary, and reasonable expenses of office rent, postage, stationery, and clerk hire." Yet we do not know what will be the amount of these expenses. These officers are now better paid than the men who are fighting in the field; and there is a great struggle to get these positions. I am opposed to increasing the pay of the provost marshals while we refuse to increase the pay of officers and soldiers in the field.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by adding thereto the following:

And in all cases where heretofore persons drawn under supplemental drafts to fill quotas shall have furnished their principals, and both are held in actual service, those drawn as supplemental shall be discharged from such service.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all debate upon the section and pending amendments be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That this proviso shall not apply to any person who shall knowingly have enlisted any minor under the age of sixteen years, or any minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years where the consent of the parent or guardian has not been given as provided by law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, as amended,

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 45, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Long, Marcy, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Wadsworth, Webster, Wialley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—77.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Ashley, Baxter, Blaine, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Perlman, Pike, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Starr, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilson, Woodbridge, and Worthington—45.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cresswell, Dawes, Deming, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Frank, Harrington, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knox, Le Blond, Loan, Maltory, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Moorhead, Morrill, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Sweat, Upson, Voorhees, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wilder, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

OSAGE INDIANS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriations to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty made with the Great and Little Osages in Kansas, August 29, 1863; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting a statement of the clerks and other persons employed in the Post Office Department during the year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The hour of half past five o'clock, p. m., having arrived,

The SPEAKER adjourned the House until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1865.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the credentials of Hon. WAITMAN T. WILLEY, chosen by the Legislature of West Virginia a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865, which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the establishment of a mail route from New Ulm to Red Wood Falls, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the establishment of a post or garrison at some point in the southwest corner of that State; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of granting a bounty to the soldiers, and their legal representatives, of the Missouri State militia; of recruits belonging to the various regiments of Missouri volunteers being mustered out of service at the expiration of the term of the regiments; of the adoption of the severest retaliatory measures to compel a more humane treatment of our prisoners of war in the hands of the rebel authorities; of the completion of the southern branch of the Pacific railroad, and remonstrating against any tax on leaf tobacco; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition of William Cook, a colored man, praying compensation for the use of a certain lot of ground by the Government in the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of David Sherman, administrator of the estate of Captain Joseph Sherman, deceased, late of the town of Portsmouth, Rhode Island, praying for compensation for loss of property during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE presented a paper containing a table prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate, (in continuation of that contained in Hickey's Constitution,) of the Senators of the United States from the 4th of March, 1845, to the termination of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, 3d of March, 1865, exhibiting their names and the commencement and termination of their service respectively; the States represented by them and the classes into which they are divided, under the second clause, third section, first article of the Constitution of the United States; the regular succession in each class being shown from the commencement; which was ordered to be printed; and a motion of Mr. HALE's that three thousand additional copies be printed was referred to the Committee on Printing.

TERRITORIAL WAGON ROADS.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all other orders and take up the bill (S. No. 472) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does that postpone the making of our reports?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be the effect of the motion if adopted.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 472) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to survey, locate, and construct a wagon road; first, from Niobrara to the mouth of the Turtle Hill river, and thence, upon the most direct practicable route, to Virginia City, in Montana Territory, with a branch from the mouth of Turtle Hill river, or such other point as may be selected, to Omaha; second, from a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sioux river, via Yanton, Dakota Territory, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sheyenne river, thence up that river to its main forks, thence up the north fork to a point of intersection with the road from Niobrara; third, from a point on the western boundary of Minnesota, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sheyenne river; fourth, from Virginia City, in Montana, upon the most practicable route, to Lewiston, in Idaho.

For these purposes it is proposed to appropriate $140,000, $50,000 of which to be applied to the construction of the road from Virginia City to Lewiston; $50,000 to the construction of the road from Niobrara and branch to Omaha; $20,000 to the construction of the road from the mouth of the Big Sheyenne to its intersection with the Niobrara road; $10,000 to the construction of a bridge over the Big Sioux river, or so much of this sum as may be necessary, and any balance remaining to be applied to continuing and improving the road from Sioux City, Iowa, to the Big Sheyenne, Dakota Territory, and the remainder to be applied to the construction of the road from the western boundary of Minnesota to the Big Sheyenne river; and any unexpended money now in the Treasury, appropriated for the construction of a road from Sioux City to Fort Randall, Dakota Territory, is to be transferred from the War Department to the Department of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 751) to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Arizona, and for the survey thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 787) to incorporate the Harmony Cemetery Company (of colored persons) in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 791) granting a pension to Sophia Brooke Taylor, widow of the late Major Francis Taylor;

A bill (H. R. No. 792) for the relief of Henry Karstens; and

A bill (H. R. No. 793) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent of Josiah Copeland, for a new and useful improvement in boot-crimps.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of Chapin Hall;

A bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce; and

A bill (H. R. No. 780) to pay each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension roll, $300 annually, as a gratuity, in addition to the pension now paid them.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 774) to establish certain post roads, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 756) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print two thousand copies of the addresses made in the Senate and House of Representatives on the death of Hon. Thomas Holliday Hicks, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 764) to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company, of the city of Washington, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S.

No. 425) to revive for a certain time the provisions of the act of 1846 relative to suspended entries of public land, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, and a petition of citizens of Michigan in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a ship-canal from Portage Lake to Lake Superior, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company praying compensation for certain Army cook-wagons, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 475) for the relief of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

NAVAL JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to take up Senate bill No. 465. It is a little bill of only one section, creating a law officer in the Navy Department.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 465) to create the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer in the Navy Department, to be called the Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General, at an annual salary of $4,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have been trying this whole session to get reports from the various heads of Departments stating how much money has been paid for counsel and attorney fees by the different Departments. We have had responses to the resolution of inquiry from all the heads of Departments but the Attorney General, and those reports have been ordered to be printed. We have established as one Department of the Government the office of Attorney General, and we have district attorneys all over the United States paid by the Government; and yet nearly every Department of the Government is now having its separate attorneys to attend to the business of the particular Department. If this practice is to go on, I think we had better abolish the Attorney General's office. They have Solicitors and Assistant Solicitors in the Treasury Department. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] at the last Congress got through a bill for a Solicitor in the War Department, and they have also in that Department a Judge Advocate General, and I do not know how many attorneys. Now the Naval Committee come in and want an Attorney General's office for the Navy Department practically, but I believe they call him a Judge Advocate General. I suppose his duties will be to attend to courts-martial, and to prize cases, and to advise the Secretary of the Navy generally, and I suppose that instead of the Navy Department calling on the Attorney General for the construction of the laws which ought to be settled by him for all the Departments of the Government, this counsel of the Secretary of the Navy will lay down the law for that Department, and the counsel of the Secretary of War will lay it down for that Department, and so on.

Really, I do not think there is any necessity for the creation of such an office. So far as general legal questions are concerned, they ought to be referred to the Attorney General, and his decision should be binding upon all the Departments. So far as courts-martials are concerned, let them detail some officer to act as judge advocate, as has been the practice heretofore, and will have to be after this office is created, as my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] suggests. I think we have gone far enough in creating these different law offices in the separate Departments of the Government.

Mr. GRIMES. This is a matter in which I have no greater interest than the Senator from Illinois or any other member of this body. The bill was sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs by the Secretary of the Navy, with a letter accompanying it, which I send to the desk to be read. I will state in this connection that it is utterly impossible for the Attorney General to attend to the legal business that is required to be attended to by the Navy Department. The only result of the defeat of the bill will be that the Navy Department will be obliged to employ counsel occasionally instead of having a regular counsel whose merits and qualifications we pass upon when we confirm him as Solicitor.

The Secretary read the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, February 20, 1865.

SIR: Many, and some of them very important, legal questions and suits, growing out of the transactions of this Department, are constantly arising. Some of them involve large pecuniary amounts and frequently embrace great variety of detail. The cases of courts-martial are numerous, and require scrutiny and careful preparation and revision. The forms and execution of contracts under the provisions of law demand deliberate and attentive care and consideration. Frauds and abuses on the part of contractors and employes call for investigation and prosecution, and the miscellaneous legal questions which arise are innumerable, involving often a vast extent and variety of detail.

For these important duties the Department has no law officer. I would, therefore, respectfully suggest that the interest of the Government would be greatly promoted were Congress to create the office of "Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General," to be attached to this Department. The officer to fill this position should be selected by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to attend to the matters herein indicated, and to any special duties that may be assigned to him by the Secretary of the Navy.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

HON. J. W. GRIMES,

Chairman Naval Committee United States Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I had no doubt that the Secretary of the Navy was in favor of having an Attorney General's office under his control. It is very convenient to have solicitors for each head of a Department, to throw upon them the responsibility of construing the laws; and I suppose each bureau will want one by and by if this practice is to go on. Here it is proposed to create the office of Solicitor for the Navy Department, at a salary of $4,000. I think the creation of such an office is entirely unnecessary, but I do not mean to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it. I have called attention to it. I do not believe it is in harmony with the organization of our system of Government to have an Attorney General's office—for that is what it amounts to—in each Department of the Government. If that is to be done I think we might as well abolish the Attorney General's Department which we have.

I know that counsel are being employed all over the United States by these different Departments. I tried at the last session of Congress to secure the adoption, and I supposed Congress had adopted, the suggestion and put a limit upon the fees that were to be paid to district attorneys of the United States. We passed a law making the maximum sum that any attorney should receive $6,000, but it seems that three days afterward we passed a law allowing them a percentage, as I am now informed by a letter in my possession, received within a day or two from the Secretary of the Interior. He states in the letter that the amount of money appropriated in the proper bill by the House of Representatives for the judiciary fund is $500,000, and in this letter he asks that $200,000 be added to that appropriation, so as to make it $700,000; and why? I do not know but that it would be as well in this connection to have his letter read. He says that the money which is paid to district attorneys and special counsel in prize cases is so large that it will require next year $200,000 more than it has been usual to appropriate for the judiciary fund. I think it is about time we stopped this practice. I will read a few sentences from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

"In this connection the attention of the Committees of Ways and Means and on the Judiciary is respectfully invited to the provisions of the fourteenth, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth sections of the act to regulate prize proceedings and the distribution of prize money, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1854, (Acts of the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, page 306.)

The fourteenth section makes, in a certain contingency, the costs or charges allowed by the court in prize proceedings a charge upon and payable out of that fund. The order of the court would seem to be conclusive both as to the amount of the charges and the fund liable therefor. Within the last few weeks two accounts have been presented by a firm in the city of New York, one amounting to $7,619 63, and the other to $9,343 57. They have been allowed by the proper court, and declared by an order thereof to be a charge upon the fund in question.

The other sections above referred to make the fees of special counsel in prize cases, or for the defense of captors against demands for damages, &c., &c., a charge under certain circumstances upon that fund. When such fees are audited and allowed by the Department incurring them, and the Solicitor of the Treasury, nothing remains for the Secretary of the Interior but to draw his requisition for the amount.

"I have no means of information which will enable me to determine the amount of the costs and charges which will constitute a claim upon that fund. The fund, too, is diminished by allowing district attorneys an additional maximum in prize cases by the twenty-first section of that act, although Congress by the second section of an act approved but three days before the passage of the act in question had, except in cases mentioned in the proviso, limited their annual maximum compensation to $6,000. (Id., pp. 195, 196.)"

I call the attention of Senators to this, and I should like to know how many members of the Senate were aware of the section increasing the allowances of these fees when we had had a controversy on the subject, and only three days before passed a law fixing their maximum compensation. Perhaps it got in through some conference committee, and none others understood it.

Mr. GRIMES. I am happy to inform the Senator that that prize law, when it came from the House of Representatives, was referred to the very eminent committee of this body known as the Judiciary Committee, and was reported back by them unanimously to the Senate, and was passed by the Senate. I was present when it passed, and remember all about it. It did not come in through any conference committee, but was passed by the Senate on the recommendation of the committee of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not had time to look into the laws nor to see the history of the law referred to, but I can assure the Senator from Iowa that if any bill went through the Judiciary Committee which allowed district attorneys an additional compensation over $6,000, I never understood it, and I think I must not have been present when that bill was passed if that provision was in it. I am quite sure that no such bill, with my knowledge, ever went through the Judiciary Committee. I will not undertake to say that it may not have been reported by the committee, but I know I was not apprised of it. I may have been absent at the time; I was absent during part of the last session, as is well known to the Senator and perhaps to others. I think it very remarkable, after the controversy we had, if such a bill could have passed that committee without observation. The Secretary of the Interior says further:

"A further charge upon this fund is imposed by the third section of the act of July 2, 1864. (Id., p. 373.) The expenses of persons found upon captured vessels, when not chargeable to the prize or other fund, and the expenses of prisoners sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary by naval court-martial are defrayed from that fund.

"I have no doubt that the sum provided by the Senate amendment—the same as given for the present fiscal year—would be sufficient but for the provision rendering it liable to the costs in prize cases, although it is impracticable to make an exact estimate of the amount which they will reach. I conceive it to be my duty to recommend that the appropriation be increased to the sum of $700,000."

That is in consequence of this legislation. I hope that it may be appropriate upon some bill that is now pending to enact a clause that no district attorney shall have, from any fund whatever, more than $6,000 in a year as his compensation from the Government, and I hope to have the support of the Senator from Iowa in putting it on, and I trust he will see the propriety of not building up a solicitor's office in the Navy Department. All I want now is to ask that when the vote shall be taken on the passage of this bill it be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I have nothing to say in regard to the compensation that the district attorneys of the United States in the several districts have received, or are now receiving, or ought to receive. Probably I shall agree with the Senator from Illinois, and vote with him whenever he shall propose an amendment to the present law such as he has suggested. I think if there are so many evils from the passage of this little law it is exceedingly to be regretted that the watchfulness of the Senator from Illinois was not aroused at an earlier day, when we had under consideration here in the Senate not only the appointment of a Solicitor for the War Department, but the appointment of a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and an Assistant Judge Advocate General with the rank, pay, and emoluments, I think, of a colonel of cavalry. Here it is proposed to establish in the Navy Department an officer who is to be styled the Solicitor and Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department, who is to perform all the duties that are required of these various officers in the War Department, and I have proposed it and I advocate its passage here today because I am satisfied that it will save a great deal of money to the Treasury, and not take money out, as the Senator from Illinois seems to apprehend.

Your Secretary of the Navy has already informed you that there are thousands of different legal questions being raised every day in the Navy Department, which the Department is called upon to decide. It is impossible to get a legal opinion from the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General, because they are nearly all the time during the session of Congress engaged in arguing cases before the Supreme Court. The Secretary of the Navy has no authority to call to his aid the Solicitor of the War Department or the Solicitor of the Treasury. He is compelled to go outside and employ other attorneys, and when he employs one man in one place and another man in another, it necessarily follows that the aggregate amount paid to those various lawyers far exceeds the salary that it is proposed to give to this officer.

If we pass this bill I have no doubt that a good man will be selected, an eminent lawyer. If such a man is not selected, the Senate of course will refuse to confirm the appointee; and we shall then have somebody who will be responsible to the Navy Department and the country for the legal opinions that shall be given, and for the conduct of the Navy Department in that regard; and I think that in the future a great many of the faults that have been attributed to the Navy Department will be obviated, if we have some regular attorney who is to advise that Department upon legal questions. I have nothing further to say on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am rather disposed to vote for this bill, for the simple reason that if we do not make such a provision the Secretary of the Navy will, under the head of special attorneys, expend twice or three times the sum. I saw in the document laid on our tables this morning that he has already paid to one man more than the salary provided for by this bill. There are some very curious items exhibited by this document to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. I am always rather in favor of good large fees to the profession, and disposed to see them charged in proper and reasonable cases; but I think, on the whole, the exhibit made by this document is remarkably liberal to the profession. I see that the revenue service paid to one lawyer, from July 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865—and a gentleman, too, of not the most eminent character, although a very respectable and creditable lawyer in New York—$5,900 for six months' service in revenue cases.

Mr. GRIMES. That was not for naval purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer to the Navy Department presently. That Department has been pretty liberal in allowing fees also. I see that the amount allowed to one gentleman in New York for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, was $2,550, and for the six months from July 1, 1864, to January 1, 1865, $5,900, as "retainers and services in revenue cases." I see that there was also allowed to the district attorney of New York, for extra services in revenue cases for the same six months, $6,085, and there are various allowances of very large amounts. The late Assistant Attorney General, whose salary was $3,000 a year, has done a great deal better by resigning; for since he resigned last summer, he has been paid $5,000 for services in two classes of cases. This document shows that there was paid to T. J. Coffey, as "special counsel in California land claims," $2,000, and to T. J. Coffey, as "special counsel in prize cases," $3,000. He has made, then, at least $2,000 by resigning. It seems to me these allowances are rather unreasonable.

The Secretary of the Navy has been very liberal also. The Navy Department allowed to Nathaniel Wilson, for services and expenses from March 15 to August 1, 1864, in the preparation of certain cases for trial by court-martial, $2,500; and to the same gentleman, for services and expenses in the examination of the accounts of Isaac Henderson, $750; and to the same gentleman, for services and expenses in the preparation of the case of Joseph L. Savage, $300—making over thirty-five hundred dollars to a single lawyer for a few months' service. It seems to me we had better allow the Secretary of the Navy one attorney, and forbid him to employ others. In my judgment the power granted to heads of Departments to employ special attorneys has been abused, and I am not disposed to continue it. I think it would be better to give to each Department a solicitor whose legal opinion it should take, and give him time to examine cases, and then I would restrict or take away entirely the authority to employ special attorneys. I am disposed to vote for this bill, and I think we ought to go a little further and take away from the Secretary of the Navy the power to employ special attorneys unless in very peculiar cases.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio, if he will look at the table in the document to which he has referred, will find that the remedy he proposes will be entirely nugatory, because the War Department has a Solicitor now, and that does not obviate the employment of these men or the payment of these fees by that Department. The only thing you will gain by the appointment of this Solicitor in the Navy Department will be that you will create a new office with a salary of $4,000, but you will not obviate the necessity of allowing these special fees. That officer will have his office here in Washington; his salary will be $4,000, and I suppose he will have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general. [Laughter.] But the necessity for the employment of special attorneys, if it exists at all, will exist just as much after you have made this Solicitor as it does now. If you look at the return made by the Navy Department you will see, I think, that there is not one of those cases where the duty could have been performed by this bureau officer if he was here. For instance, Mr. Sleeper was employed at New York, and Mr. Wilson was liberally paid nearly four thousand dollars, but that was at New York, and the same thing would have been done, probably, if there had been a Solicitor of the Navy Department here.

I do not blame the Secretary of the Navy for asking authority to create this office, and I expect the bill will pass. When I heard it read I had the same opinion of it that the Senator from Illinois had; but I had had such poor luck in opposing the creation of new offices, and the increase of salaries, and the advancement of rank, that I had pretty much made up my mind to let the thing go, because opposition seemed to be of no use. I suppose this bill will pass. It will make a new place; this officer's salary will be paid, and special fees will be allowed by the Navy Department just as is now done by the War Department. The bill will be no sort of remedy for the evil that is complained of. The Senator from Ohio is altogether mistaken in his notion in regard to that.

There is another thing that I should like to know, but I am not aware that we can get at it, and I do not know that it is exactly pertinent to this inquiry. I should like to know, however, how much these gentlemen have been paid by virtue of these appointments, beside what they have got out of the Treasury. I do not know how the fact is, but I wish somebody that does know would tell me whether, in regard to some of these gentlemen that have been paid for investigations, in New York and Washington for instance, in prize cases, the captors who were entitled to a share of the proceeds of the prize have not been taxed a percentage on the amount they received, which percentage has gone to pay these special attorneys. That of course does not appear in the sum sent here from the Navy Department as paid by the Department. I am told that is the case. I do not know it, and therefore I will not affirm it; but I should like to know how the fact is before I vote.

Now, sir, I hope that all those who think the rebellion is to come to a close, and the country is to be saved from the burdens of taxation under which it labors by the creation of new officers with large salaries, will vote for this bill; but it is a little singular, it is very singular, that this Department, which has had the administration of the naval affairs of the country for four years, should never have seen the necessity of this office until about fifteen days before its head is going out. There has been no such recommendation from the Secretary of the Navy until the 20th of February, if I caught correctly the date of the letter which was read. This Administration will go out of office on the 4th of March—at least a portion of them will—and it is not impossible that the Secretary of the Navy may go; but whether he does or not the Administration ends; and it is a little curious, if the experience of the Navy Department has shown the necessity for such an officer, that it should not have been found out until about fifteen days before the Secretary is going out of office. Sir, it is a device to create a new officer and give him a large salary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am glad, Mr. President, that opposition has been made to this measure by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. An opposition coming to it from this side of the Chamber might be considered outrageous. I shall vote against the bill for two reasons. The first is, that it is to be presumed that a Cabinet officer is capable of understanding and expounding the law applicable to his Department. Another reason is, that I believe the law was better expounded when the Departments had no Solicitors than it has been since; and if the law is to be murdered by any new Solicitors of Departments, as it has already been murdered by existing Solicitors, I think we had better have no more.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this bill first came before the Committee on Naval Affairs, I doubted whether it ought to be adopted; but upon a more careful examination of it I decided to give it my support, not that I think it will very materially reduce the expenditures of money paid to lawyers in particular cases, for as one looks over this report that comes from the Departments, he is impressed with the notion that these payments are made to particular individuals for political services rather than for services in the courts. I do not believe that there has been a condition of affairs in the courts in which the interests of the Government in the courts justified anything like such an expenditure as this exhibit shows. But I believe that a Solicitor in a Department is a very useful officer, and in that respect I am compelled to differ from my friend from Delaware. When I was connected with the General Land Office, in several instances I discovered the very great importance of the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury in the preparation of causes. It is not expected that the Solicitor will leave the Department and try the cause in court, but it is expected that the Solicitor will prepare the cause for trial in court; that he will supervise every step up to the time of trial, and then that the cause will go to the district attorney and be easily disposed of in his hands.

Every Senator is aware of the fact that legal questions of a new sort are springing up every day in the Navy Department. I suppose there are a hundred contracts now made by that Department where, heretofore, there were but a few. There has been a very great increase in the contracts out of which litigation is likely to arise. I think, therefore, it is proper that there should be a law officer for that Department, quite as important as for the War Department. Perhaps the business will not be so large, but it is of the same class. I shall therefore vote for this bill, not that I think it is going to reduce the expenditure of money to lawyers outside, for I do not believe that expenditure has been made with reference to the public interest in very many cases. Anybody running his eye over this list of attorneys who have been employed will be satisfied of that, I think. But let us give the Department the proper officer, a law officer, to prepare the cases for the courts, and then hold the Department to an honest discharge of its duties.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the bill is passed I want to say a word as to the report to which reference has been made. If it were not so late in the session I should move, on the information I have, that some committee be charged with the duty of inquiring into the matters stated in the report. Some complaint has been made of the amounts of money that appear to have been paid out. I have been informed this very morning by an officer of the Government that $15,000 was paid to one attorney for fees by an officer in one of the Departments, but it does not appear in this report.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes; it is here.

Mr. CARLILE. The Senator will find it on page 3.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, I see it now. I was informed that there was another payment which does not appear here. I will not make a motion for a committee now; there is no time to investigate it this session; but by some construction or other of the resolution which the Senate passed I think we have not got out all the facts in reference to the payment of fees to attorneys by the different Departments.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall, under the remarks of the Senator from Iowa and of the Senator from Ohio, vote for this bill, but at the same time I will make a single remark upon the great abuse which in my opinion is exhibited by the facts that have been disclosed in this debate. There are various legal officers that are authorized or that assume the authority to employ assistant counsel. Why is that practice adopted? It is in the first place because of the flagrant incompetence of the men appointed to those offices to fill them and to discharge their duties. In relation to the first legal officer of the Government, who I believe has an assistant with a large array of clerks and other officers in his office, I have never met a solitary man in the Senate or out of the Senate who did not concede his incompetence to fill that office. When that is the fact, when these high and responsible legal offices are filled with incompetent men, and when legal ability and general intellect do not regulate the appointment or are scarcely taken into consideration in making the appointment, and men flagrantly incompetent to perform the duties of the office are put in, it necessarily involves one or the other of these consequences: the public interest must be neglected, or there must be men appointed to assist them in the performance of their duties who are equal to the performance of those duties.

I think the Senate itself is responsible in a great degree for the numerous employment of counsel to assist officers in the execution of the appropriate duties of these officials, because of their incompetence; and the Senate is responsible, for it confirms men admittedly incompetent to discharge the duties of these high legal offices. I hope that the honorable and vigilant Senator from Illinois, who presides with so much ability and fidelity over the Committee on the Judiciary, will at the next session—there is no time at the present—get up a bill regulating the whole subject of the employment of counsel to assist the officers of the Government, and restricting the amount of compensation that these officers and the assistants employed by them should receive.

There is no small abuse of the Government more pernicious and more lavishly indulged in than this. It is a convenient and a safe mode of enriching favorites, giving them plunder, buying up men of easy virtue to prostitute former political opinions, and to enlist as mercenaries in a new cause and a new party. Sir, I do not believe in any such changes of opinion. I should like to see this practice cut up by the roots. I do not believe, either, in the employment of incompetent men, from political favoritism and other considerations, to perform the duties of offices to which they are wholly inadequate, and I trust that the honorable Senator from Illinois will bring up this subject, and have it regulated by a proper bill. I think it is very probable, though, that the duties and interests of the Navy Department, so far as they are of a legal character, would be more aptly and ably and economically attended to by this Solicitor if we can get a competent man to fill the office, and under the assurance of the Senator from Iowa, I hope if the bill passes we shall get such a competent man.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Hale, Howard, Morgan, Salsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Farwell, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Nye, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wilkinson—13.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

A bill (H. R. No. 751) to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Arizona, and for the survey thereof—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 787) to incorporate the Harmony Cemetery Company (of colored persons) in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 791) granting a pension to Sophia Brooke Taylor, widow of the late Major Francis Taylor—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 792) for the relief of Henry Karstens—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 793) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent of Josiah Copeland for a new and useful improvement in boot-crimps—to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HOWE, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the second amendment.

T. O. HOWE,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. G. BLAINE,
R. MALLORY,
G. S. ORTH,

SOUTHERN INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate copies of all orders, permits, licenses, and correspondence in any way relating to licensed traders in the southern superintendency, or any information in his office connected with the subject of trade in said superintendency.

PICTURE BY W. H. POWELL.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol. I seldom ask the Senate to take up a bill in this way; but I now make this motion.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be some debate on that.

Mr. COLLAMER. Only a few minutes, I think.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Joint Committee on the Library to enter into a contract with William H. Powell, of the State of Ohio, to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases in the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory; the particular subject of the painting to be agreed on by the committee and the artist. The entire expense of the picture is not to exceed $25,000, and $2,000 are to be paid to Mr. Powell, in advance, to enable him to prepare for the work, the remainder in installments at intervals of not less than one year, the last installment to be retained until the picture is completed and put up.

Mr. SUMNER. I am sorry that this resolution has been called up, and I am sorry to feel obliged to say anything upon it. The patronage of art is always beautiful, but there is a time for all things; there is a time to weep, and there is a time to laugh, and there is a time for the patronage of art; but permit me to say that this is not

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 69.

the time. Now, sir, when our debt is accumulating at the rate of more than a million a day, when our soldiers are still unpaid, this is not the time to appropriate $25,000 for a picture to adorn the national Capitol—

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana, upon which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is entitled to the floor.

MR. COLLAMER. Let that be informally laid aside that the resolution which was taken up on my motion may be disposed of.

MR. HOWARD. I will yield for the purpose of allowing that to be acted upon.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday will be informally laid aside if there be no objection.

MR. HALE. There is objection.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If there be objection, the unfinished business must be proceeded with, unless a motion is made to postpone it.

MR. COLLAMER. I move that it be postponed for the purpose of disposing of the joint resolution which has been taken up.

MR. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be postponed; but the other matter can be continued informally.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. To do that requires unanimous consent.

MR. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont, I trust, will not ask the Senate to displace the regular order.

MR. COLLAMER. How shall I ever have this resolution acted on? Some one is sure to object.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will allow the Chair to suggest that the resolution which was taken up on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, if it now goes over, will stand as the unfinished business of the morning hour, and will have that place on Monday morning.

MR. COLLAMER. That will do.

MR. HALE. On that point I desire to make a suggestion. If I am not mistaken—and I hope that I shall get the ear of my colleague—one of the gentlemen who have occupied the chair has held that there is no such thing as the unfinished business of the morning hour taking precedence.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair cannot be responsible for the decisions made by any other individual. He decides as he has now decided and has always decided, and such has been the practice of the Senate all the time he has been in the chair.

MR. CHANDLER. Before my colleague proceeds, I ask his indulgence to allow me to report three or four bills from the Committee on Commerce and have them acted upon. They are of great importance, and I have been trying all the morning to get them in, and I am sure they will not lead to debate and will not occupy long.

MR. HOWARD. I will yield for that purpose if I do not thereby lose my privilege to the floor.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The reports of the Senator from Michigan can be received by unanimous consent.

MR. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection; the reports will be received.

ADMEASUREMENT OF TONNAGE.

MR. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of ships and vessels of the United States," have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage, and as it is very short and there can be no objection to it, I desire to have it put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States, approved May 6, 1864, shall be so construed that no part of any ship or vessel shall be admeasured or registered for tonnage that is used for cabins or state-rooms, and constructed entirely above the first deck, which is not a deck to the hull.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHIGAN CITY HARBOR.

MR. CHANDLER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor, report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask unanimous consent to pass it now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to the Michigan City Harbor Company, at Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, the privilege of using the foundations of the old Government piers now in that harbor for the purpose of improving and protecting the harbor; and no expense made by the Harbor Company for this purpose is to be considered a charge against the Government. It also proposes to constitute Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, a port of delivery, subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery of the United States, and it is to be annexed to and made part of the collection district of Chicago. A surveyor of the customs, to reside at the port, is to be appointed, who shall receive an annual compensation of $350 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

MR. CHANDLER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels, have directed me to report it back and to ask for its passage now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides whenever it shall become necessary for the owner or owners of any vessel of the United States navigating the western rivers and the waters on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, otherwise than by sea, and being in a district other than that to which the vessel belongs, to procure her enrollment and license, or license, or renewal thereof, the same proceedings may be had in the district in which the vessel then shall be as are now or shall then be required by law, on application for such enrollment and license, or license, or renewal thereof, as the case may be, in the district to which the vessel may belong, excepting the giving of bond and the enrollment and issuance of license; and the officer before whom such proceedings shall be had shall certify them to the collector of the district to which the vessel belongs, who shall thereupon, on the owner or owners giving bond as required in other cases, duly enroll the vessel and issue license in the same form as if the application had originally been made in his office, and either deliver the license to the owner or owners, or forward it by mail to the officer who certified to him the preliminary proceedings, and who shall, in such case, deliver the license to the owner or owners or master of the vessel. The act is not, however, to be construed so as in any respect to change existing laws, excepting in so far as it enables such owner or owners to procure enrollment or license, or renewal thereof, without returning their vessels to their home ports or districts.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

MR. CHANDLER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes, report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask that it be acted on now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to revive and reenact the first sentence of the second section of the act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, approved March 3, 1815, to wit:

"That it shall be lawful for any collector, naval officer, surveyor, or inspector of the customs, as well in any adjoining district as that to which he belongs, to stop, search, and examine any carriage or vehicle of any kind whatsoever, and to stop any person traveling on foot or beast of burden on which he shall suspect there are goods, wares, or merchandise which are subject to duty, or which shall have been introduced into the United States in any manner contrary to law; and if such officer shall stop any goods, wares, or merchandise on any such carriage, vehicle, person traveling on foot, or beast of burden, which he shall have probable cause to believe are subject to duty or have been unlawfully introduced into the United States, he shall seize and secure the same for trial."

And every such beast of burden, carriage, or vehicle, together with the teams or other motive power, and all the appurtenances used in conveying such goods, wares, or merchandise, are to be subject to seizure and forfeiture in like manner as is by law now provided in regard to such goods, wares, or merchandise. All fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered in consequence of such seizures are to be disposed of as is provided in other cases by the ninety-first section of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, approved March 2, 1799, and the last proviso of that ninety-first section is hereby repealed.

By the second section the power and authority given to collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, by the sixty-eighth section of the act of March 2, 1799, are extended to inspectors of the customs, and any officer or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under this or any other law of the United States, may be examined as a witness in any of the proceedings for the recovery of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture by either of the parties thereto, and such examination shall not deprive the witness of his or her share or interest in such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

The third section provides that in case any store, warehouse, or other building, shall be upon or near the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable goods are deposited or have been placed therein or carried through or into the same without payment of duties, and in violation of law, and the collector, deputy collector, naval officer, or surveyor of customs, shall make oath before any magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that such offense has been therein committed, such officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto; and if any such goods shall be found therein, the same, together with such building, shall be seized, forfeited, and disposed of according to law, and the building shall be forthwith taken down or removed. Any person or persons who shall have received or deposited in such building or carried through the same any such goods, or shall have aided therein, in violation of law, shall, upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

It is further provided that the first section of the act of April 2, 1844, entitled "An act directing the disposition of certain unclaimed goods, wares, or merchandise, seized for being illegally imported into the United States," shall be so amended that in place of the word "one," where ever the same may be found in that section, the word "five" shall be inserted.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT OF SALEM AND BEVERLY.

MR. CHANDLER. I also report back from the same committee the bill (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly, Massachusetts, and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to abolish the office of naval officer for the district of Salem and Beverly, in the State of Massachusetts, and to abolish the office of surveyor for the district, to reside at Beverly, and also to provide that the salary of surveyor of the district shall hereafter be $400 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes; and had receded from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to that bill (not considered by the committee of conference) and agreed to the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 463) for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes; and it was signed by the Vice President.

RECESS—BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] proceeds, I move that at the hour of half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock, for the purpose of then proceeding to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to that.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the only time when there will be any possibility of considering the bankrupt bill, and I appeal to the friends of that bill, if it have any, that they will at least endeavor to secure an opportunity for bringing it to the consideration of the Senate and get a vote, as I think we can, after a very short discussion. I would appeal also to those who are opposed to the bill, that, as a matter of justice, we should at least have an opportunity of taking the sense of the Senate upon it. To those who are charged with important bills which they are desirous of pressing upon the Senate for consideration, and have been pressing for days past, I submit that it is but fair to give an hour or two—I shall ask no more—to the consideration of this bill; and if in the course of an hour or two the Senate can be brought to a vote upon it, I think great good will be done to the country; and if within that time a vote cannot be had upon it I shall certainly not ask that it be taken up at another time to interfere with any other business of the Senate. I believe that between seven and nine o'clock this evening we can get a vote upon that bill, for I do not think there are many amendments to be proposed to it, and the Senate will be prepared to act and vote upon those which may be offered. If we cannot do it before nine o'clock this evening I give my word to the Senate that I shall not again press it on their consideration during the session. I ask this, and I submit that it is but fair to those who desire that this bill should receive the action of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to this motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Let a vote be taken on it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not allow a vote to be taken which shall supersede the pending measure until we get through with it, if I can help it. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor. He has given it away for nearly half an hour, and now the Senator from Connecticut takes the floor to seek to get up another bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion cannot be entertained except by the consent of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. I give my consent cheerfully if I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit that the motion is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not interfere with the Senator from Michigan, and if his speech should not be concluded by the time at which I propose to take up the bankrupt bill I shall not ask that he be interfered with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has a right to yield the floor to any Senator to make any motion. He has yielded to the Senator from Connecticut, and the question now is on agreeing to the motion submitted by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the question on taking a recess, or on making the bankrupt bill the special order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to take a recess from half past four to seven o'clock for the purpose of acting on the bankrupt bill at seven o'clock, and the Chair will understand that, if that motion be agreed to by the requisite vote, and will rule, if the Senate shall come together at seven o'clock under that order, that the bankrupt bill would be the special assignment for that hour and would therefore necessarily come up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to make a few remarks on this motion, and the manner in which it has got before the Senate. It is known, perhaps, from remarks which have already fallen from the Senator from Michigan, that he is opposed to the joint resolution he is about to discuss. Being opposed to it, and being entitled to the floor, he gives way for the purpose of having other motions interposed to delay that resolution. He is quite willing that the resolution should be delayed. I presume he will vote to postpone it at any time. Being entitled to the floor as he is, the Chair has ruled properly, I have no doubt, that he has a right to give way for any of these motions. The Senator from Connecticut, however, is not opposed to the pending measure. It is manifest, I apprehend, to the Senator from Connecticut, as it is to all of us, that if we are to have any action upon the Louisiana question, we must hold on to it, and probably have a night session for that purpose. The Senator from Michigan is not the only Senator who desires the floor on that question. I know of some other Senators who desire to speak on it, and are prepared to do so, and there is no sort of probability of our ending the discussion on the Louisiana question between now and the adjournment at half past four o'clock. I have no objection to that part of the motion of the Senator which proposes a recess from half past four until seven o'clock, but I do object to that part of it which makes the bankrupt bill the special order for seven o'clock. And I do not think it exactly fair on the part of my friend from Michigan to take the floor upon a question, whatever his views may be about it, and then having control of it to yield the floor for motions to displace it. Now, sir, with these remarks I leave the question. I trust the Senate will not vote to supersede the question now pending by the bankrupt bill.

Mr. FOSTER. One word only. The Senator from Michigan certainly ought not to be censured by the Senator from Illinois, for I am to blame if anybody is, because I asked the Senator from Michigan to give way. Respecting the subject to which the Senator from Illinois alludes, I believe I agree with him as to its importance, and that it is desirable to pass the resolution. I go with him heartily in believing that it is most important and most desirable to pass it; but I did not suppose that the Senate intended to consider that question to-night; I have no idea that that was in the minds of the Senators; and I asked to-night for the bankrupt bill, not believing that it would interfere with this measure. But I will not take up time. I only ask for a vote on the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to ask a question for information. I understood the Chair to state that in case a recess was ordered for the purpose of taking up the bankrupt bill this evening, that bill would be the special order after the recess. What I desire to know is this: would the unfinished business, when we adjourn at the recess, be displaced so that it would not come up regularly on Monday at one o'clock?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a special order for that hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that if two thirds of the Senate shall concur in this motion, it will override the unfinished business. If a bare majority agree to this motion it will not override the unfinished business. It requires a two-thirds vote to make a special order. The present motion is equivalent to a motion to make the bankrupt bill a special order, and if carried by a two-thirds vote will have that effect, but if the motion be agreed to by less than a two-thirds vote it will simply amount to a recess, and the unfinished business will not be superseded.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to this matter, my own feeling is that if it does not displace the unfinished business, I am for giving the evening to the consideration of the bankrupt bill. I have no objection to its coming up for the evening, with the understanding that that business and none else be discussed this evening.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very glad the Senator from Connecticut has made the motion he has. Indeed I have regretted that there has been such a delay in the consideration of the bankrupt bill. It is a very important practical question, with regard to which there are numerous petitions now on our table from all parts of the country. The business of the country is interested in it to an extent perhaps that it is not in any other question, unless it be the tax bill. It ought to be considered, and the Senate ought to have an opportunity of hearing the Senator from Connecticut on the subject. I wish to hear him on the subject, and as at present advised I wish to vote for that bill or for a bankrupt bill when it shall have been matured in this Chamber. I hope therefore that his motion will prevail.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for a division of the question, first on a recess and then on making the bankrupt bill a special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a divisible question in the opinion of the Chair. The first question is on taking a recess from four and a half o'clock until seven o'clock this evening. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not mean to have the yeas and nays on that branch of the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will so regard it if there be no objection. The yeas and nays will be taken on the other branch of the motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit whether this motion is divisible; whether it is not one and indivisible, being to take a recess for a specific purpose. It is not a motion generally for a recess. I submit whether, after the yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion, the party making the motion is not entitled to a vote upon the motion as made.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest that the motion must be divisible, because its two branches require a different vote. A majority can determine the question of recess, while to make a special order requires a two-thirds vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt on the subject. The motion is one which embraces two distinct propositions. The parliamentary law, in the opinion of the Chair, is, that any question may be divided into as many distinct propositions as would stand distinctly and separately by themselves. Here the motion embraces two distinct propositions, first to take a recess, and second to make a particular bill a special assignment. The question now is on taking a recess from four and a half o'clock to seven o'clock.

The proposition was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 18, nays 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next question is on assigning the hour of seven o'clock for the consideration of the bankrupt bill, and on that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cardie, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Harris, Morgan, Nye, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wade—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, and Wilkinson—9.

So the Senate refused to make the bankrupt bill the special order for seven o'clock.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. STEWART. Before the Senator from Michigan, who is entitled to the floor on the special order, proceeds, I desire to move for the printing of one hundred copies of the bill (H. R. No. 640) to provide for a district and a circuit court for the district of Nevada and for other purposes, as it has been passed by Congress, in order to have a number for distribution in Nevada. The people there will be anxious to know what the law is, and I move that one hundred copies of it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator's motion is unnecessary. We have now a standing order by which all laws that are passed are printed immediately, and he can get copies in a few days.

Mr. CONNESS. The law will be printed in a few days in the Chronicle, and the Senator can send any number. The publication of the laws is not much behind in the Daily Chronicle.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the motion.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish, with the consent of my friend from Michigan, to send to the Chairman amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time to the pending resolution. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert this as a substitute:

That it is the duty of the United States at the earliest practicable moment, consistent with the common defense and the general welfare, to reestablish by act of Congress republican governments in those States where loyal governments have been vacated by the existing rebellion, and thus, to the full extent of their power, fulfill the requirement of the Constitution, that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That this important duty is imposed by the Constitution in express terms on "the United States," and not on individuals or classes of individuals, or on any military commander or executive officer, and cannot be entrusted to any such persons, acting, it may be, for an oligarchical class, and in disregard of large numbers of loyal people; but it must be performed by the United States, represented by the President and both Houses of Congress, acting for the whole people thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That, in determining the extent of this duty, and in the absence of any precise definition of the term "republican form of government," we cannot err, if, when called to perform this guarantee under the Constitution, we adopt the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence as an authoritative rule, and insist that in every reestablished State the consent of the governed shall be the only just foundation of government, and all men shall be equal before the law.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That, independent of the Declaration of Independence, it is plain that any duty imposed by the Constitution must be performed in conformity with justice and reason, and in the light of existing facts; that, therefore, in the performance of this guarantee, there can be no power under the Constitution to disfranchise loyal people, or to recognize any such disfranchisement, especially when it may hand over the loyal majority to the government of the disloyal minority; nor can there be any power under the Constitution to discriminate in favor of the rebellion by admitting to the electoral franchise rebels who have forfeited all rights and by excluding loyal persons who have never forfeited any right.

Sec. 5. And be it further resolved, That the United States, now called at a crisis of history to perform this guarantee, will fail in duty under the Constitution, should they allow the reestablishment of any State without proper safeguards for the rights of all the citizens, and especially without making it impossible for rebels now in arms against the national Government to trample upon the rights of those who are now fighting the battles of the Union.

Sec. 6. And be it further resolved, That the path of justice is also the path of peace, and that for the sake of peace it is better to obey the Constitution, and, in conformity with its requirements in the performance of the guarantee, to reestablish State governments on the consent of the governed and the equality of all persons before the law, to the end that the foundations thereof may be permanent, and that no loyal majorities may be again overthrown or ruled by any oligarchical class.

Sec. 7. And be it further resolved, That a government founded on military power, or having its origin in military orders, cannot be a "republican form of government" according to the requirement of the Constitution; and that its recognition will be contrary not only to the Constitution, but also to that essential principle of our Government which, in the language of Jefferson, establishes "the supremacy of the civil over the military authority."

Sec. 8. And be it further resolved, That in the States whose governments have already been vacated, a government founded on an oligarchical class, even if erroneously recognized as a "republican form of government" under the guarantee of the Constitution, cannot sustain itself securely without national support; that such an oligarchical government is not competent at this moment to discharge the duties and execute the powers of a State; and that its recognition as a legitimate government will tend to enfeeble the Union, to postpone the day of reconciliation, and to endanger the national tranquillity.

Sec. 9. And be it further resolved, That considerations of expediency are in harmony with the requirements of the Constitution and the dictates of justice and reason, especially now, when colored soldiers have shown their military value; that as their muskets are needed for the national defense against rebels in the field, so are their ballots yet more needed against the subtle enemies of the Union at home; and that without their support at the ballot-box the cause of human rights and of the Union itself will be in constant peril.

I ask to have this amendment printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, by the official census of 1860, the number of white persons in the then peaceful and loyal State of Louisiana was 357,629. By the proper election returns in the same State, of the presidential election of that year, it appears that the number of persons who voted in Louisiana at that presidential election was 50,510. On the 26th of January, 1861, a popular convention of that State was held in the city of New Orleans, and that convention, after what they regarded as due deliberation, passed the following ordinance:

"We do further declare and ordain that the State of Louisiana hereby resumes all rights and powers heretofore delegated to the Government of the United States of America, that her citizens are absolved from all allegiance to said Government, and that she is in full possession and exercise of all those rights of sovereignty which pertain to a free and independent State."

It was the declaration of the national independence of the people of Louisiana. Immediately upon the adoption of that treasonable ordinance the State, like other States, became the theater of an insurrection against the authority of the Government of the United States. On the 16th of August, 1861, the President of the United States, acting under and in pursuance of an existing statute, declared the State of Louisiana and several other States of the Union to be in insurrection, armed insurrection against the Government of the United States. This fixed the political status of that State; at least from the date of the proclamation of the 16th of August the people of that State, as a political community, were and have remained and still are in a state of armed, bloody insurrection against the authority of this Government. The President of the United States, in his proclamation of the 1st of July, 1862, nearly one year after his first proclamation, again pronounces the State of Louisiana to be in insurrection against the lawful authority of the Government under which we live. On a third occasion, and by his proclamation of the 1st of January, 1863, commonly known as the emancipation proclamation, he again solemnly proclaimed to the world that that State was still in insurrection against the authority of this Government. It is still by law and in fact in a state of insurrection; its people are to-day as a community hostile to the Government of the United States, and its territory is hostile territory so far as the statutes of the United States and the proclamations of the President of the United States, in pursuance of those statutes, are evidence of that fact. The State has not yet been reclaimed by conquest; a very small portion of it is now within even the military grasp of the Government, and even as late as the amnesty proclamation of the President, dated the 8th of December, 1863, the fact that that State and its people are in insurrection against the authority of the United States is again recognized by the President. I find in that proclamation the following language:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Virginia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election in the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election laws of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.'"

There is an assertion of authority on the part of the Executive of the United States—made, I confess with pleasure, with the best of motives and intentions, and for patriotic ends—an assertion that the President of the United States, whenever one tenth part of the people constituting the population of any one of the eleven rebellious States shall see fit to constitute a government for the State, will recognize of his own accord such government as being the legitimate government of the State, entitled to all the guarantees contained in the Constitution of the United States to a State peaceful and in the Union. And, sir, he gives this assurance at a time when all these States were engaged, by his own confession, the admissions of his own solemn proclamation, in a wicked, bloody, and wanton insurrection against the Government itself over which he is presiding as Chief Magistrate. Sir, I cannot recognize the authority of the President of the United States without the subsidiary aid of an act of Congress to give any such assurance to a community in insurrection against the United States. I ask the friends of this measure, I ask those gentlemen in this body who are so anxious for the passage of this resolution, which is, or will be, a recognition of this assertion on the part of the President of the United States, where in the Constitution do they find an authority given to him authorizing him to assure one tenth part of the people of an insurrectionary State that they, to the exclusion of all other portions of the population of that State, shall be recognized as the State, and be entitled to all the benefits of the guarantee contained in the Constitution? Sir, it seems to me, without imputing or intending to impute any wrongful intention to the excellent President of the United States, that here is an attempt to stretch the executive authority beyond anything which the country has thus far witnessed, and I think it is time Congress, in whom, according to my ideas, rests, and rests solely, the authority of readmitting and reconstructing the rebellious States, should lay hold of this subject, assert their power, and provide by some statute of uniform application for the reconstruction, as it is called, and readmission, of the insurrectionary States. That is their right and their duty; that is not the right, it is not the duty, of the President of the United States, in my opinion.

Mr. President, in order to determine what extent of power Congress possesses over a State once in rebellion, and now subdued by the national arms, we must look into the nature of the State governments, and the relations they bear to the national Government. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] in the discussion of yesterday, seemed to be very much perplexed in his mind to determine what is a State. He put the question with a great deal of earnestness and emphasis, and, as I thought, with an earnest disposition to have it answered. I was in hopes the Senator would himself have furnished an answer which should at least have indicated clearly what his own opinion is on that very important question; but I regret to say he left my mind still in the dark as to what his real opinion was upon the point.

What, then, is a State? A vague idea seems to prevail in some quarters that mere territorial extent defined by certain geographical boundaries composes a State; that as this superficial extent of country is included within the jurisdictional limits of the Federal Government, and cannot by any physical possibility be put or got out of those limits, the State is always and necessarily in the Union; that the State remains the same, however treasonable may be the conduct of its inhabitants toward the national Government; that as Congress has no power, without the consent of a State, to alter its boundaries, the rights of the State, as a State, are beyond our reach under the Constitution; and that although its people may have rebelled against our authority, and crimsoned their soil with the blood of loyal men, yet the moment we have subdued them by our arms, the State, the land, the geographical superficies, is endowed with original State rights—rights which shield its inhabitants against any exertion of the national authority except in the reestablishment of Federal courts of justice, post offices, custom-houses, and other machinery for the enforcement of the acts of Congress; but that over the domestic affairs of the inhabitants, those affairs which in the absence of insurrection would confessedly have pertained to the State alone, we have no power whatever, and that the inhabitants residing on the tract of land known as the State are at once remitted to all the rights of State sovereignty, as it is called, and Congress excluded from all interference and rights of interference in their domestic affairs.

I aim to state the objection fully and fairly, and as favorably as is possible to its advocates. This is due to them and to the gravity of the question itself; a question it must be confessed which transcends in magnitude any that has ever been forced upon Congress.

And it is of the highest importance that at the outset we should have clear ideas of the subject and understand perfectly the antagonist proposition.

I repeat, I understand the ground taken to be that whenever we have subdued and overcome the insurrectionary forces in a disloyal State, and so far disarmed the insurgent inhabitants of their hostile power as to leave no reasonable ground to apprehend danger of future armed resistance, there supervenes, ipso facto, from the time of such overthrow of their military force, the right of the inhabitants of the State again to enter upon their career as a State; to organize or resume a State government, according to their own notions and preferences; to enact all such laws as they may see fit to enact, and to be and remain a State of the Union with all the powers and immunities of a State of the Union; and that they may do this in spite of the will of Congress or of the Executive, and independently of both. This I understand to be the view of the learned Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

And this proposition, in a thousand varying forms, has been pressed upon the consideration of the country, both in and out of Congress. It has been and still is the great Democratic argument against the apprehended consummation of the policy of emancipation and the consequent destruction, forever, of the old coalition between the southern slave-owner and the northern Democrat, that ancient and cherished alliance which in truth and in fact occasioned this civil war and all its woes!

Let us bring the objection to the test of argument; and if we find it fallacious, especially if we find in it an element of danger to our future peace, let us not be afraid to expose the fallacy and to take security against the danger. This is no time for timid counsels or hesitating policy. We are called upon by every consideration of patriotism, of duty to our country, of duty to the present and to future generations, to the cause of free government and popular liberty, now intrusted to our sole keeping, to put aside fear and hesitation, and, in fortifying ourselves against future outbreaks and rebellions, to be animated by the same heroic firmness which has given victory to our arms in the field and on the waves.

What, then, is a State? What are its essential attributes, without which it is no State?

A State is a moral person, a political community, possessing the faculty of political government. Its being does not consist of geographical extent, but of the united will of the persons who have their domicile within its limits. To attribute to the mere land the qualities of a State would be to mistake the cradle for the child, the vessel for the crew, the dress we behold moving before us for the immortal spirit within.

The land is, of course, indispensable as affording room for the working of this will, but is incapable of exercising or receiving any political faculty or right; as much so as is the tombstone of indicating the present thoughts of the departed. It is nothing, absolutely nothing, but the theater on which the political community moves and acts, but is endowed with no thought, no right, no duty.

It is not, therefore, in the argument of this question, entitled to any weight or consideration whatever, except as being the unconscious theater and footstool of the thinking beings residing upon it; and we must, therefore, confine our attention to them. They constitute the State. They alone are the subjects we are to consider. If rights exist they alone possess them; if our powers are to be exerted it must be upon them only, and with a view to influence their action, with a view to bring their will into unison with our own.

However captious and trifling may seem the objection founded on the inquiry, what is a State of the Union, it is fortunate that even this query was fully solved by the Supreme Court of the United States at an early day, and within a period of only seven years after the present Constitution went into operation.

The court says:

"Every particle of authority which originally resided in Congress, or in any branch of the State governments, was derived from the people who were permanent inhabitants of each province in the first instance, and afterward became citizens of each State; that this authority was conveyed by each body-politic separately, and not by all the people in the several provinces or States jointly; and, of course, that no authority could be conveyed to the whole but that which was previously possessed by the several parts; that the distinction between a State and the people of a State has in this respect no foundation, each expression in substance meaning the same thing."

I refer to Penhallow's case, 3 Dallas's Reports, page 94. If my friend from Missouri will look at that decision he will find a clear exposition of what was understood by the Supreme Court at that early day to be a State of the Union.

A State of the Union or a State in the Union is, therefore, a people yielding obedience to the laws of the Union, that is, the acts of Congress and the national treaties. It is a people who willingly perform the duties of a State required to be performed by the Constitution; a people who have a State government which is republican in form; a people who were one of the original thirteen States which formed the United States, or a people who have, since the adoption of the Constitution, been, in the language of that Constitution, "admitted by the Congress into this Union" as States upon an equal footing with the original States; for this equality of rights and powers as States is plainly implied by the language and the manifest intention of the instrument; and no other people except such original State or admitted State; none but a State which permits the laws of the Union to have full scope and force within its limits; none but a State which sends Senators and Representatives to Congress friendly to the Government itself, willing to vote men and money to support and uphold it, who believe that a person forcibly resisting its authority is a traitor and deserving of death; none but a State which is willing to bring to trial, to convict such a traitor, and to punish him for his treason; none but a State whose population is capable of furnishing both the grand jury to indict and the traverse jury to convict such a traitor; none but a State whose population and whose authorities are in favor not only of permitting the laws of the United States relating to civil rights to be executed, but who are willing that the punitive code of the nation, the code of vengeance against its enemies, shall be carried out; none but such are States of the Union. A State, being a moral person, must have a will; it must, in accordance with the reasoning of the same high tribunal in the same case, "be a complete body of persons, united together for their common benefit to enjoy peacefully what is their own, and to do justice to others."

To be in fact a State of the Union and in the Union, this will or consent of the people must be in harmony with the Constitution, and its movements subsidiary to it. It must regard the Constitution as its highest political good; its injunctions as the highest human law, its commands as the infallible and final measure of civil duty. In short, to be in the Union is to be actively and willingly coöperating with other States in the performance of all those acts and things without which the Federal Government cannot act or move, cannot perform the functions required of it by the Constitution; it is to elect Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States; to permit the courts of the United States to be held within their limits, and its citizens to act as jurors and officers of the court; to permit the judgments and sentences of the court to be executed against its citizens; to permit the United States mail to be carried through the State and its contents distributed according to law; to permit the officers of the United States to collect the Federal revenue whether derived from foreign or domestic products; to permit the United States to manage and control their own property, whether consisting of forts, dock-yards, arsenals, mints, or public lands; to make such elections of Senators and Representatives freely and as the means of maintaining itself as a State in the Union; and to permit all these things willingly and freely as rights belonging to the Federal Government with which neither the State government nor the people of the State have any right whatever to interfere. In short, to be a State in the Union is to use all those powers of the State which have a relation to the Federal Government in a manner friendly to that Government friendly to its existence and continuance, in a manner promotive of the objects of that Government; and to permit without hindrance the exercise within the State of all the powers of the Federal Government.

Whether a State which should merely omit to send Senators and Representatives to Congress would for that reason cease to be a State of the Union, it is not, perhaps, worth while now to inquire, though my opinion would be that such a State delinquency would not be followed by that consequence. But surely, if the State has gone further; if it has gone the length, as a political community, of not only refusing to participate in our legislation, but of making war upon us, concerted, open war, war evidenced by the employment of armies and navies against us, it would be folly, madness, to say that the State was not our enemy in every sense in which that term can be employed to describe hostile relations between independent communities. The State, in that case, becomes our enemy, and becomes such for the same reason that any other community becomes such, whose actual Government for the time being wields the military forces of that community against us. By the law of civilized war, an organized community, and an organized or recognized war on the part of that community, are all that are requisite to constitute its Government a hostile Government as to us, and its citizens or subjects our enemies. No one will pretend that such a community is in the Union in fact, for that would be to make an admission and in the same breath to contradict it. De facto, such a community, and, if it be bounded by State lines, such a State, is as completely out of the Union as is Canada or Mexico, from the moment it assumes the attitude of hostility until it is subdued and conquered by our arms, or until it voluntarily lays down its arms, ejects its hostile government, and returns in fact to its once friendly sentiments and friendly relations to the Federal Government.

Friendship for the Federal Government, in other words, loyalty, thus becomes the final test in solving the question, what is a State in the Union? If a State by its overt acts has shown a want of this friendship, it is no longer in the Union de facto, and cannot be treated as if it were. The Supreme Court, acting upon the soundest principles of public law, have decided the waging of war by a State, although acting under an illegitimate and revolutionary government, renders her territory enemy's territory, and the people there resident enemies of the United States, in the sense of the laws of war. And their decision could not have been different.

Well, then, the State is in fact, though wrongfully, out of the Union—out of the Union because its actual, present government is disloyal and treasonable. It is out of the Union in the same sense in which Ireland or Scotland, if actually in arms against the authority of the British Parliament, would be out of the United Kingdom; in the same sense in which Ireland was out of her union with England when her people, at the instigation of the expelled James II, took up arms against the Prince of Orange, the actual reigning sovereign; in the same sense in which La Vendée was out of the French republic when, following the lead of George Cadoudal and other royalist chiefs, the people of that province took up arms against the then Government of France; out of it in the same sense in which an insurgent county of a State would, during its unsubdued hostility to the State, be out of the State; out of it, because unsubdued rebellion makes it for the time being an independent though unrecognized nation on the earth's surface, throwing off its allegiance to its paramount Government, and assuming by the sword to assert its separate nationality.

I shall not stop here to enter into the curious historical theme, what is the origin of nations, but suggest that the student will, to the possible discredit of human nature, discover that in at least nine cases out of ten that origin will be found in the application of successful military force; that in a general sense, and in historical truth, the sword of the conqueror has been the origin of nations, and that compacts social, compacts political, compacts religious, have all been trodden in the dust, and have disappeared beyond the power of invocation or appeal, beneath the iron heel of the warrior. Thus crushed and obliterated, statutes, treaties, constitutions cease; and the impartial muse of history seizes upon the moment of victory, as the beginning of the conquering nation, and no longer heeds the parchment scrolls which record the injustice of the war or the perfidy of the successful party. Such has been the melancholy record left us by the past, a record in which our own country and continent cannot claim exemption from the general rule.

But we are at war with the rebel States, and are told by those whose mouths are full of complaints and criticisms as to the mode in which this war is waged, and as to the imputed objects to be obtained by it, that the Government, so far at least as the rebel States are concerned, is under some peculiar constitutional restraint by which its hands are tied; that we are prohibited from "subjugating" those States; that all we can do, under the Constitution, is to break up the military array of the rebels, disperse their armed bands, take away their arms, and do that very indefinite duty, restore order; that thereupon our task is ended and the rebel States have a constitutional right to come back into the Union and participate in the enactment of Federal laws and the conduct of the Federal Government. And we are menaced both in Congress and out with terrible retributions if we conquer or attempt to conquer, if we subjugate or attempt to subjugate, the rebel States. It is admitted by these our critics that in an international war, a war in which the United States are one party belligerent and some other independent Power of the earth is the other, we should have all the rights and powers of other independent nations, and might rightfully conquer our adversary, subdue our adversary, subjugate our adversary; that is, that we might make a complete conquest of his people and his territory, as complete as that of Great Britain over Canada in 1762, when, as Mr. Bancroft tells us, the conquest of the province by Great Britain was complete; complete and perfect in all respects as is recognized by the modern code of war.

Now, I need not tell the Senate that even under such a complete conquest the usages of war and the laws of nations allow the conqueror only to substitute his political authority for that of the former sovereign, and forbid him to disturb the titles of the peaceable and submissive subjects of that sovereign to their property, real or personal, or to inflict any hardship upon them beyond the ordinary war contributions required for the support of the victorious army. The municipal laws of the conquered country remain unchanged, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the change of sovereignty, and the property of individuals is protected by the conqueror on their submission to his authority. Now, it is lawful to wage such a foreign war for the purpose of effectuating such a complete conquest, and of course lawful to attain it; lawful to substitute the authority of the conqueror for that of his adversary; lawful to substitute the political authority of the United States for that of a hostile foreign nation in the case of an international war, (for otherwise the war cannot be a successful one), and for that of the hostile State in the case of a war between the United States and a State. There is, because there can be, no difference between the two cases; for in each, the former actual hostile government must be supplanted by the Federal Government. In the case of foreign territory no one would or could doubt that it is the exclusive right of that Government to take the place of the former sovereign and to erect its own ensigns of power. In the case of a rebel State subdued by the arms of that Government, is not such State equally at its feet, or rather under the shield of its conquering protection? Who but that Government has then the right to give the law? Has any other State or people? No. Has the rebel government that right? No; for that government is abolished and its agents dispersed. Have the conquered rebel people that right? No; for that would be to allow them at once to expel their conquerors by a popular decree, and to deny the supremacy of the Federal Government that has subdued them. Has the old State government, the once loyal government, the right to govern the conquered people? No; there is no such government. It has long since ceased to exist. Its functionaries have all forsworn and abandoned the old State government. They are gone; some driven into exile, many dead, but by far the largest part of them open traitors, hostile to the conquerors, and utterly opposed to reestablishing any State government acknowledging allegiance or friendship to the United States. In fact, there is no government there, none at all, which can for a moment be recognized or permitted by the United States, as the party now holding the actual mastery of the country; and like every other case where the possession of a country has arisen from the use of superior force, the will of the conqueror is the law—that is, the will of the United States expressed, in the absence of acts of Congress, by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, but by the acts of Congress after Congress has spoken.

I can see no escape from this conclusion, that the United States, as the other hostile party, the party who, in suppressing the rebellion by military power has conquered the rebel country, and who holds it, as it must necessarily hold it, in the iron gripe of war; that the United States have the right, as the conqueror, to rule and govern the State as conquered country, subject for a time at least to their sole will. If this be not the case, then the State is without any government, and is exposed to all the horrors of anarchy, to murder, and private rapine. No one will deny that we have a right to subdue by arms and to reduce to quietude and submission a rebel State, that is, the people of a State in insurrection. But how absurd to make this concession, and at the same time to deny to us the constitutional power to occupy and hold the territory and its people in our military grasp—an occupation just as necessary to the end in view as the firing of cannon, the charging of cavalry, or any other operation in the field.

But the question forces itself upon us, has the Government of the United States the same rights of conquest, the same ample powers of control and disposition of a conquered State as of a conquered foreign territory? In case of a foreign war we acquire what was before not ours, whether it be person or territory; and the conquest has then no claim whatever to the rights and privileges of a State of the Union, but must beyond all doubt be treated as a territorial dependency of the United States, to be dealt with just as Congress shall see fit. But the State which is subdued was never rightfully foreign to the United States, was ever de jure part and parcel of the nation, and endowed with the powers and privileges the Constitution leaves in the States. The true objects of the war, therefore, the ultimate objects to be attained by it, are the suppression of the rebellion, the reestablishment of the original Federal authority within the State, and the revival of the loyalty of the people of the State as the sole foundation and condition of all its civil rights as a State of the Union and of the right of its people to be treated as friends and not as enemies. Although the United States have the full and complete right which conquest gives, for the purpose of subjecting these domestic enemies to the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution to Congress, and for the purpose of restoring to the body-politic its vital blood, loyalty to the Government, yet those purposes, those distinct ends, are without doubt limits beyond which we cannot go. We are restrained by the manifest objects for which the national Government was formed; but restrained by no particular clause of the Constitution. The instrument contains no such clause, and the limitation and restraint are of precisely the same nature as those which any other Government is under in subduing an insurrection of its own subjects or citizens; the plain object of the war in both cases being the restoration of legitimate authority and the revival of allegiance. And until this revival of allegiance there must be the same need of military occupation and repression in both cases.

It is not to be denied that the Government of the United States, as organized under the Constitution, depends for its formal and legal existence upon the existence of the States. The Senators and Representatives from the States in the Union are alone the law-makers. The electors chosen by their people under their laws make the President of the United States for four years only. An abstinence of a majority of the States for more than four years to choose electors, more than two years to choose Representatives, or more than six years to elect Senators, puts a formal end to the Government of the United States under the present Constitution; and as the existence of the States is indispensable to that of the Federal Government, it is not permissible by mere interpretation to clothe that Government with a power permanently to abolish the State government by way of punishing or suppressing the rebellion; or to convert the States into mere Territories of the United States, that is, public domain, to be divided up afterward by lines different from those of the States, and again admitted into the Union like matured Territories, with such new geographical limits as Congress may see fit to establish. It seems to me that such a proceeding would be in very direct violation of that clause of the Constitution which declares that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress. It appears to me that this express prohibition indicates that the Government of the United States was to be forever disabled to change the boundaries of any State once in the Union without its consent; its consent in its capacity as a State, freely given by its own Legislature. And in this respect I regret to differ from what would seem to be the President's opinions as expressed in his amnesty proclamation. He observes:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that any provision which may be adopted by such State government in relation to the freed people of such State, which shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which may yet be consistent, as a temporary arrangement, with their present condition as a laboring, landless, and homeless class, will not be objected to by the national Executive. And it is suggested as not improper, that, in constructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws, as before the rebellion, be maintained, subject only to the modifications made necessary by the conditions hereinbefore stated, and such others, if any, not contravening said conditions, and which may be deemed expedient by those framing the new State government."

What, then, are the powers of the United States over the rebellious States? I reject the idea that they can be converted into Territories. Plainly, under our system, a Territory of the United States implies land never lying in any State, land ceded to the United States either by the old States, or purchased or conquered from foreign nations. The term never has been used to describe a State, or any part of a State; and it implies not only the ownership of the soil and right of disposition, but full and complete political jurisdiction in the Federal Government over the people resident there. On a question of such magnitude we ought to avoid inappropriate language and terms of equivocal meaning.

The objects of the conquest being such as I have stated, it follows that it is the duty of Congress, on taking military possession, to endeavor by all reasonable means to effect those objects, and that in its very nature such forcible occupancy is temporary, and ought to cease the moment those objects are attained. This cannot be done without establishing a government to preserve order, life, and property—a provisional government, for that is the true historic name to be applied in this as in all cases where an old government has been overthrown; a provisional government instituted by the conqueror, and to be continued just so long as Congress may find it necessary to continue it for the attainment, and while attaining, those high objects. The occupancy, that is, the possession of all the reins of local government by the Federal authorities, (for I do not wish to be misunderstood or to mislead by mere generality of phrase,) is but temporary, provisional, fiduciary. It must necessarily last until the Federal Government has done its duty in the reestablishment of order and the revival of loyalty. Until then it is, and must be, the omnipotent sovereign of the State, holding actually by right of conquest, though for a particular purpose, and being itself necessarily the final judge to determine when its tutelary mission has been accomplished.

I thus steer clear of the question whether a State can commit suicide, that is, extinguish its own being, by waging a rebellious war against the Federal Government; and I show that instead of presenting any such abstract question of political dialectics the case merely presents the usual question, presented whenever and wherever there has been a forcible revolution. What is the duty of the paramount and lawful Government in its treatment of insurgent communities? And is not the Government doing its whole duty in punishing the ringleaders in the revolt and restoring the old and constitutional Government over those districts?

I have said the Government must be the final judge how long this military occupation shall last. Its duty in this respect is plain. It is bound by the plain terms of the Constitution not only to suppress the insurrection, which it has done the moment it has obtained firm possession of the hostile territory and not less than the whole of it, but to guaranty to the once loyal but now conquered State a republican form of government. To perform this high and sacred trust, time of course is necessary, and not only one but a great variety of means and instrumentalities, of all which the Government of the United States must, because it has no superior, no equal in the matter, be the sole and final judge. These means may embrace acts of provisional legislation, creating private rights and duties not previously in existence, but existing by law and of a permanent nature, paramount to all subsequent State legislation because arising under the supreme authority of the nation, as for instance the giving freedom to slaves; or they may undoubtedly embrace conditions to be performed by the subdued States on taking their places again in the Union, such as would be an ordinance forever abolishing slavery in the State. And I cannot by any means admit as the true interpretation of this clause the narrow view taken of it in yesterday's debate by the Senator from Missouri, that it applies only to a preëxisting republican form of government. It is, sir, in my view, a broad and beneficial power given to Congress for the safety not merely of each of the States, but of the nation; the great mass of Americans, who each and all, at home or abroad, have the deepest interest in the faithful exercise of this guardian power.

Such, Mr. President, it seems to me is the unavoidable and invincible logic of military occupation. If you admit the rightfulness of the fact, if you admit that we may conquer and occupy, you must admit the conclusions I have thus drawn from that right; you must admit the rebel communities are in our power, not for evil, not for destruction and desolation, not to make a desert that we may call it peace; but for good, for the high purposes announced in the Constitution, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Yet while thus in our military power, awaiting our action, looking to their restoration, nothing is clearer than that the citizens of the rebel States, though owing obedience to all the laws of the United States, possess no political rights under the Constitution except protection. They are not free to act, because their freedom to act would, if indulged, lead them again to draw the sword against the United States. They are subject, and necessarily subject, to military repression, and must so remain until the Government of the United States shall see fit to relieve them from it. They have no right to send members to this body or to the House of Representatives, much less to participate in the election of President and Vice President. They are the ward-provinces of the United States, progressing toward the maturity of revived loyalty, but not yet entitled to exercise the elective franchise or to participate in the enactment of laws.

If I am asked what I mean by the Government of the United States, and whether I mean that the President as Commander-in-Chief has the exclusive power to establish these provisional governments, I answer, I do not. He has the right to regulate military occupation until Congress has acted upon the subject; because by the usages of war the victorious general in the field has a right to regulate it until controlled by his government at home. But the establishment of provisional governments, the quieting of the rebellious province and the reëstablishment of legitimate authority over it, pertains to the sovereign power, that is, the law-giving power of the nation. With us that power is lodged in Congress and not in the President; and in my opinion it is the business of Congress, and Congress alone, to establish and uphold these provisional governments; to make provision for the reëstablishment of the national authority and the revival of State loyalty; to make good the guarantee of a republican form of government to each insurgent State. In short, not only to enact laws but to provide for the putting in execution of all laws necessary to carry into effect the powers granted. And hence I hold it to be the duty of Congress to provide for the pacification of the rebel States and their readmission into the Union, and not to leave this most important and delicate matter floating in the public mind in the haze of doubt and uncertainty between the supposed claims of the President and those of Congress. We need not doubt that whatever we see fit to enact will be approved and carried out by the President. We cannot be more truly anxious than he to fix upon a stable, firm policy for restoring peace and union; but we ought not to shut our eyes to the necessities he will continually be under, to the almost irresistible importunities he will encounter, to provide some sort of civil government for the subdued States or districts; or to the consequences of leaving such mighty questions for him to decide. It is our plain duty to establish a uniform rule on the subject, so that all may be treated alike and the same remedy be applied with a paternal but firm and resolute hand to each delinquent State.

If I am asked whether I favor the scheme of allowing one-tenth or any other minor part of the male citizens of a State to organize a State government and assume to act as a State, I answer no; and for two reasons: first, because as against the will of an actual majority the government of such a minority must necessarily come to a speedy end and thus invite a renewal of the civil war, in that locality at least; and second, because government by a minority is of evil example and inconsistent with the genius of American liberty. Whatever may befall, whatever may be the result of the present great struggle, we cannot, we must not abandon the principle of civil government by a majority. It is the vital principle of republicanism. To renounce it is to stoop over our necks to the yoke of a one-man tyranny, or, what is far worse, far more intolerable, the tyranny of a many-headed but individually irresponsible oligarchy. On this question let us proudly and forever adhere to the principles of the highest judicial tribunal of the nation, announced as from the very cradle of American law—from the sacred aditus of the public faith—that "the great distinction between monarchies and republics (at least our republics) in general is that in the former the monarch is considered the sovereign and each individual of his nation as subject to him; but in a republic all the citizens as such are equal, and no citizen can rightfully exercise any authority over another but in virtue of a power constitutionally given him by the whole community; and such authority when exercised is in effect an act of the whole community which forms such body-politic," and that "mankind have long practiced upon the principle that a majority shall bind the whole." I refer to the weighty words of Judge Iredell, pronounced in 1795. As a Republican I would sooner hazard ten slaveholders' rebellions than risk liberty in a government by a minority.

I do not, because I cannot, attach too much importance to this principle. The will of the majority is the soul of the Government in a republic. This is a postulate. But when we speak of government by a majority we speak of a community made up of persons loyal and faithful to it. Traitors and aliens are always excluded from the category. Their hostility or indifference to the Government is universally admitted to be a sufficient cause for their exclusion. But where, as in some of the rebel States, there is an actual majority of the unfriendly, or where, as in others, the numbers of the friendly and the unfriendly are so evenly balanced as to leave a contest between them of doubtful result, we are in fact dealing not with a loyal but a hostile community, and the necessity of adhering firmly to the principle becomes still more manifest. In both cases the prevalence of the will of the friendly can be secured only by military force employed to restrain the will of the unfriendly. Such a government, if intended as a civil government, is not republican in the sense of the Constitution. It is a government, not of free will, but of force. It is not the Roman senate, but Caesar's legions, that govern—or, rather Caesar's sole will, supported by the lances of his veterans, that gives the law.

I do not condemn the employment of force to suppress rebellion, disorder, or anarchy. It is the only means of defeating the unfriendly projects of a party so strong and dangerous. But it is perfectly certain that such a party, comprising within itself the physical strength and the numbers of the State, will, the moment your military repression is taken off, leap forth with an energy irritated by its former subjection, and dash in pieces a government sustained only by a minority. The withdrawal of the military arm would be but the signal for the renewal of that reign of terror which once brooded over the seceded States, that dark night of tyranny and blood, beneath whose thick clouds, tinged with the lurid light of fratricidal war, the stoutest heart quailed, and the strongest lover of the Union grew pale. It would be but an invitation to the guerrilla and the freebooter to recommence his work. It would be to let loose upon the peaceable minority all the pent-up evil passions which produced and sustained the war. It would be to fling open the door of the dwelling of the once expelled but now restored Unionist—ay, the door of the humble dwelling of the widow and the orphan, made such by the rebellion—and to invite the ruffian to enter with knife in one hand and torch in the other to reek his vengeance upon the defenseless inmates. It would be indeed to provoke a realization in our own republic of the frightful visions of Catiline, who, cursing his country which he could not destroy, and defying the senate whose timidity still tolerated him in his seat, exclaimed of the future of Rome—

"Look to your hearths, my lords; for there
Thenceforth shall sit, instead of household gods,
All shames and crimes;
War, treachery, with his thirsty dagger drawn,
Suspicion poisoning his brother's cup,
Naked rebellion, with torch and axe
Making his wild sport of your blazing homes,
Till anarchy come down on you like night!"

Who that has a heart throbbing with sympathy for the sufferings of southern Unionists will thus expose them to the vengeance of their enemies? What friend of the honor of this nation, an honor that should be eternally as bright and spotless as burnished gold, on which neither time nor chance can fix a stain, can willingly subject them to another reign of terror or to the chance of such an exposure? The measure now before you proposes to acknowledge eight thousand citizens of Louisiana as the State, and to give them the rights and privileges exercised by a voting population of more than fifty thousand in 1860. Eight thousand are thus to give the law or assume to give it to forty-two thousand—to more than five times their number. This they may do so long as their decrees are sustained by the presence and consent of a competent military force; but we all know, both parties there know, the world knows, and, sir, posterity will know, that it is not the eight thousand who govern the State, but the fear of the bayonet, and the fear is inspired solely by the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy! Disguise it, or attempt to disguise it, as we may, to this complexion doth it come at last. Yes, sir, both the eight thousand and the forty-two thousand voters are governed not by themselves, but by the bayonet! And this is at present the only government in Louisiana. The object of the present measure is to continue this hybrid, unnatural government there. It allows the meager and almost contemptible proportion of less than one sixth of the voting population to govern the whole State, and to have the influence of the whole State in our legislation here, while we know that if the military forces were withdrawn that privileged one sixth part would be swept away like chaff before the hurricane breath of the enraged majority. Sir, such a government is the merest bubble, especially if unsustained by military power. This is too obvious to need further comment.

To preserve order, therefore, and to prevent anarchy and crime, to avert the direst of calamities, a social war, that devastates and murders all before it, from the hearth-stone to the altar of God, and yells in horrid concert with the genius of desolation, to do this a military force must be kept up as the protecting guardian of this feeble and limping State governments that cannot move a step without the crutch of military aid, and which, if left to itself but for a moment, topples over and expires of inanition, of the incurable disease of being in a minority.

But all this we might possibly endure as being but a harmless pageant were it not that the measure before us clothes this mockery of a government; this king of shreds and patches, this mistletoe State régime that falls to the earth the moment it ceases to cling around the flag-staff of the national forces, with the high attribute of voting upon and determining questions of legislation, questions of war or peace, questions of prosecuting or ceasing to prosecute the present war, in this Hall and in the Hall of the House of Representatives. This measure introduces here Senators and Representatives whose immediate friends and relatives at home have deliberately aided and assisted to put to death myriads of Union soldiers from the North, and in swelling up that vast debt of more than two thousand million dollars which now rests upon the country. Think you that such Senators and Representatives, whose constituents have already been stripped of their property by the rebel government, and brought down to the depths of poverty; a community without the habits of labor among the intelligent classes; naked, hungry, despondent, and sullen; think you that their Representatives would at the present time be safe depositories of the power to tax their constituents to pay this debt? Is it not, on the other hand, the part of prudence to guard against the contingency of having that debt repudiated by such legislators and the still more disgraceful contingency of being, by their votes, aided by a northern party, finally compelled to pay the rebel debt of $4,000,000,000? And tell me, what right has Louisiana, the majority of whose population is to-day, wherever they are, hostile to this Government and anxious for its overthrow; what right has she, upon any recognized principle of public law or justice, to be represented in Congress? Her skirts are still dripping with the blood of the defenders of the Government. The crime of treason still rests like a blight upon the majority of her people. The cries of the widow and the fatherless still rise to heaven from thousands of northern hearths in attestation of her unexpiated guilt. And can we as patriots, can we as prudent men, take the criminal again to our bosom while a majority of her people are our sworn enemies, and by far the larger part of her territory is now in the hands of our armed foes? Sir, it is weakness to talk of the right of such a fragment of the State to be treated as the State, and something worse than weakness to extend, in violation of all principle, the rights of a loyal State to such a community.

Again, this is to stand as a precedent for the ten remaining rebel States. We are to be at the expense of holding them all in our military occupation, to bolster up each State government, each being destitute of loyalty enough to support it among the citizens, while the State as a political community is, to the incalculable injury of the faithful States, to be admitted to all the rights of a faithful State here in Congress. Sir, I cannot by voting for such a measure tell the people of my State that although the blood of their sons has enriched every cornfield from the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico, and they have generously consented to pay their share of the cost of the war, yet that they are entitled to no greater privileges here than are the people of Louisiana, whom they have just grappled and overthrown in deadly combat. I cannot commit so great an outrage upon their feelings—so great a dishonor to their just pride and well-earned renown.

I think the project of readmitting Louisiana premature, and I fear it as a precedent. There is no sufficient foundation of loyalty for its government to stand upon. Better far to establish for it, and for all other rebellious States as they shall be reconquered to the nation, provisional governments for the regulation of their domestic affairs, but without representation here to endure until the mass of their people shall plainly see their error in attempting to overthrow their old Government, and shall be really and truly converted to fidelity to that Government by contrast with it the wretched abortion of a government established over them by the narrow bigot and petty tyrant, Jefferson Davis. I do not believe that government by a minority, in Louisiana or elsewhere, upheld by bayonets will tend to hasten that most desirable change in the southern mind, but that it will on the other hand retard it, and keep up an unnecessary and dangerous irritation against us. A brave people, fairly subdued, will yield obedience to the sway of the naked sword of a generous conqueror, while they would chafe with contempt and scorn under the rule of a feeble minority of themselves. In attempting the work of reconciliation and readmission let us remember we are republicans, and that we are laboring for posterity. Let us adhere with undeviating steadiness to the principle that, the community being loyal, the majority shall govern, which is the pole-star principle of our system—between which and despotism, either single-headed or many-headed—there is but one step, and that a short one.

Congress ought, in my opinion, to take the subject of readmission into their own hands. It is for them and not for the Executive to execute the important guarantee to each State of a republican government, and this duty presses upon us more and more as our victorious arms advance toward the close of hostilities. And in making good this guarantee, the great, the indispensable necessity is loyalty. To establish it, to give it a firm rock on which to rest, the Government must first show to its enemies and to those of hesitating loyalty that its physical power is as irresistible as its motives are benevolent. Its enemies must learn to feel a respect deep and abiding, for the arrows it carries in its quiver as well as for the shelter which its shield affords. This, in my opinion, can be done effectually only by the enactment of a proper statute, which shall present uniform inducements and means to the people of the disloyal States to return to duty, to preserve order among themselves, and to resume their position among the orbs that circle the center of the system.

Our duty is to reinstate the authority of the Federal Government in the rebellious States and to replace disloyal States with loyal States. It is to assure our friends abroad that the crisis is passed, the virulence of the disease broken, and the healing process fully commenced; and to tell our enemies that the cause of free government has triumphed, that the great American Union is safe, in spite of the sneers, the hopes, and the malignant croakings of old iron-hearted legitimacy with its Janus face and harpy fingers; safe from a gigantic rebellion, founded in hostility to the rights of man; safe from the deep humiliation of being the subject of the world-resounding scoffs of tyrants, had it faltered or failed; safe from the guilt of having filled with eternal despair the hearts of the lovers of liberty, had its defenders shrunk from the conflict or compromised, and to assure both friends and foes that the genius of that Union, standing side by side with the goddess of Liberty upon these western shores, exultant, defiant, still brandishes the flaming sword of her power in the face of all despots and intruders who would question her Heaven-given rights on this hemisphere.

Let us meet this great demand with a firmness and a faith that shall soar above all party feeling—above all profitless disputation as to the constitutional rights of an insurgent State, whether they are extinguished or only suspended; whether the State is in the Union or out of the Union; whether a State de facto out of the Union, and waging barbarous war against it, is a State de jure in the Union, and entitled to send traitors or the representatives of traitors here to sit in our legislative halls. Let us perform the plain duty of providing provisional governments for States occupied by our armies, rescue the harassed people from the tempestuous night of anarchy and blood, and once more unfolding over them the ensign of our national power and protection, say to them: "Return to the ways of peace, reverse the Government of your fathers, the Government of Washington, now grown more resistless by your opposition to it; retire to your homes; renew your oath to your old Government, and commence with us a reinvigorated national life."

Let us pass such a measure. It will in my opinion be the sure and happy augury of the return of peace. All along on the agitated border where the tempest of war has left its track of desolation, woes, and tears, and far into the interior of the insurgent dominions, it will send the prophetic sensation that the old Government is coming, not in wrath to unsubmitive children, but with visage beaming with kindness and radiant with smiles of encouragement, inspiring confidence and hope; coming to bid war cease its devastations and crimes, to restore the exile to his deserted hearth, or if that be gone, to his charred threshold or some other sacred object which reminds him that the spot was once his home.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no desire, Mr. President, to state now the reasons which will influence my vote upon the resolution on the table of the Senate, but I am willing to go on if the Senate are willing to hear, or to seem to hear. I have personally no objection to going on.

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Senator from Maryland will give me the floor, I should like to make a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think it is rather late for the honorable Senator to go on this afternoon, and I move that the further consideration of this question for this evening be dispensed with, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course I shall object to having this matter laid aside. I am sorry the Senator from Maryland should give up the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not yield the floor under the expectation that such a motion was about to be made. I supposed it was some motion in reference to ordinary business which the honorable Senator was anxious to present now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I propose in as few words as I can to state the reasons which will influence the vote I propose to give on the resolution now under discussion; but before I proceed to that duty I will state what I believe to be the facts out of which the question arises.

The State of Louisiana was said to be in rebellion by the President's proclamation issued under the authority of the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, but a portion of the State was afterward recovered to the United States, and the authority of the United States over that portion of the State was reinstated. From the time when the city of New Orleans and the surrounding country were taken possession of and subjected to the authority of the United States up to the present time that possession has never been disturbed or that authority practically denied. Until the 22d of February, 1864, the United States authority existed only as a military authority. On that day an election was held of officers under the constitution existing at the time, that is to say, the constitution of Louisiana as it existed at the time of the rebellion, and as it theoretically existed on the 22d of February, 1864. An election was held of officers whose offices were created by that constitution, and for whose election it provided. At that election there were polled 11,414 votes. Of those 11,414 voters 808 were in the military service of the United States. By the then constitution of Louisiana citizens of Louisiana entitled otherwise to vote who were in the military service of the United States were not authorized during the period of their continuance in that military service to exercise the right of suffrage. These 808 soldiers and sailors, for there were some sailors among them, would have been entitled to vote, and were entitled to vote if any citizen of Louisiana was so entitled, except for the fact that they were in the military service. They had all the qualifications required by the constitution of the State to give the right of suffrage except that.

After that election a convention was provided for on the 28th of March, 1864. That convention met on the 6th of the succeeding month, and remained deliberating upon the business which brought them together until the 23d of July, 1864, I think, when what is now called the constitution of the State was adopted. It was submitted to the people and by the people was ratified in September, 1864, by a vote of 6,836 in the affirmative, and 1,566 in the negative, and the government for which that constitution provides was organized on the 3d of October, 1864.

These, sir, are the facts. The Committee on the Judiciary—and in the conclusion to which they came I concurred—were of opinion that under the circumstances in which the State was at the period when these proceedings were had, she could not be recognized as a State of the United States under that constitution adopted in 1864, except by an act of Congress. The committee were of opinion that it was not in the power of the Executive under the circumstances to bring the State back under that constitution. They were of opinion, however, that it was competent for Congress to do so, and the only question before the committee was, whether, under the circumstances in which the State was at the time, it was not the duty of Congress to bring the State back so as to have her represented in the Union.

The objection to the conclusion of the committee—an objection which had great weight with me in the beginning—was that the proceedings which led to the adoption of the constitution were instituted at the instance and under the power of the military authorities of the United States. The precedent was apparently a bad one, it was really a bad one; and the proposition upon which we were called to decide was whether, if we were satisfied that the number of votes said to have been cast were in fact cast, and the persons voting were loyal citizens, we should deny to them the privilege of being represented in the councils of the nation, and on the contrary should subject them to a continuance of the military power. My impression is that, no matter how the proceedings were instituted, whether it was by the military authority, or by the coming together of the people of the State, if in point of fact the people of the State did act voluntarily and were competent to act under the original constitution, and were authorized to act by being loyal at the time they did act, it is the duty of the Government of the United States to receive them back.

Another objection was that, however true it might be that it would be in the power of all the voters of the State to adopt a constitution for themselves, or to claim the right of coming back to the Union under the constitution existing at the time of the rebellion, it was not true that it was in the power of fourteen thousand four hundred and fourteen voters, when the entire voting population of the State was fifty-one thousand, to take that course. As it seemed to me then, and seems now, there is no evidence to show that a single citizen of Louisiana was excluded from the right of voting. It by no means follows that there was an exclusion either in point of fact, or if in point of fact, that the exclusion was a legal one, because the vote of eleven thousand is much less than the vote that could have been cast before the rebellion commenced. First, as to the fact, where are the fifty-one thousand voters less the eleven thousand? This war commenced in 1861, and these proceedings were had in 1864. Do we not know that the greater proportion of the fighting, and therefore, in a great measure, the voting population of Louisiana entered into the military service of the confederate government? Do we not know that the result of their entering into that service is that nine tenths of them have forfeited their lives upon the battle-field; and do we not know also that those who were beyond the age of military service or under the age of military service have gone elsewhere, or if they remain in the State, that they have remained in the State not as loyal citizens of the United States, but as disloyal citizens? So then it by no means follows that the number of votes cast is not a large majority of the actual number of voters to be now found in the State of Louisiana, or however doubtful that may be, it is not only not certain, but the opposite fact would seem to be much more probable, that there was a single person excluded from the privilege of voting who should have been entitled to vote, if it be true that those who have been in the military and naval service of the confederates, or who have been in any way instrumental in bringing about or assisting the rebellion, should not be entitled to vote; and I understand the Senators on the other side who object to the admission of Louisiana into the Union are of that opinion.

That being the case, Mr. President, another thing is to be considered. What was the condition of the loyal citizens of Louisiana, in the relation in which they stand to the Government of the United States, by the act of secession? Did they cease to be citizens of the United States? Nobody pretends that. If loyal, were they not entitled to be protected by the power of the United States? If loyal, is it to be said of them that they have forfeited any of the rights which belong to them before the rebellion commenced? I suppose nobody will say that. None of the laws of the United States have been violated by them; no obligation imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States has been violated, but on the contrary observed. They have been kept from expressing their opinion by the power of the rebellion. They have had no voice by which they could ask to be admitted into the Union, because to speak such a desire was to subject themselves to punishment. They remained, however, loyal in point of fact; they remained entitled to the protection of the United States, and when the protection of the United States was afforded them and they saw that they could speak their sentiments without hazard, they met at their several election polls, organized their government under the existing constitution, and then, wishing to change it, met in convention and adopted the constitution which is now before us. Why should we not receive it?

I suppose no one will deny that it is just as much in the power of the people of Louisiana, or of any one of the seceded States, when they are entitled to vote, either before they come back or after they are received into the Union, to change their existing constitution. They have exercised an inherent right belonging to the American citizen; and he who questions the right of the eleven thousand men who have met together and adopted this constitution, questions it upon the ground, not that it is not a right which they originally held, but because there are others who have not joined in asserting it; and who are those others? Those who are in arms against the United States, men whom you would not receive if they were elected as members of the other House or appointed as Senators to this body, men who could not be received because they would be unable to comply with the provisions of a statute which you say, no doubt correctly, you had the authority to pass.

Now, if it be true that the secession ordinance had no operation to carry the State out, and that I understand even the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] admitted last night; if it be true that the State is in the Union notwithstanding the ordinance, then the only question to be considered is, who are the people of Louisiana that are to exercise the sovereign authority belonging to the State of Louisiana? Are they the loyal or the disloyal? There can be but one answer to that inquiry. It must only be the loyal.

If the State is not to be brought back in the way provided for by this joint resolution, in what way can the State come back? The honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] in his speech this morning admitted that it is not in the power of the United States to change the territorial limits of the States that have gone out, because the Constitution prohibits it. If he had thought for a moment he would have seen that the Constitution equally prohibits any interference on the part of the General Government with the exercise of the right of suffrage in a State. He and the member from Massachusetts who intimated his opinion last night, seem to suppose that under the Constitution of the United States Congress has the authority to interfere for some general undefined purpose with the exercise of the right of suffrage. I never heard it intimated before. The provision of the Constitution on that subject is, I submit, with due deference to the honorable members who entertain a different opinion, too clear for serious question. The fourth section of the first article says that:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators."

That is to say, the whole power of Congress over the subject of the time, the place, and the manner of holding these elections is to alter the regulations of the State; but how the election is to be held with reference to those who are to vote is not only not given to Congress by what I have just read, is not only, according to my interpretation of it, evidently excluded, but if there was any doubt on that question it would be solved by reference to the second section of the same article, which provides that:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Does the Constitution in any portion of it say what those qualifications are? If the Constitution does not give to Congress the authority to prescribe the qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, and if the Constitution itself does not prescribe those qualifications, it necessarily follows that the only authority in relation to the qualifications of electors is the authority possessed by the States. That is obvious, if there could be any doubt on the subject, by another consideration. What were the States before the Constitution was adopted? Had anybody a right to say who were to vote for Representatives or Senators of the State Legislatures except the State? That is very clear; and when they agreed to go into convention, and the people of the States to whom the adoption of the Constitution was submitted determined upon ratifying the Constitution, and by so doing made it a Constitution of Government for the United States, they not only in terms excluded any authority to interfere with the qualifications of electors for members of the State Legislatures, but guarded more effectually against it by providing in one of the amendments that the powers not delegated were to be considered as reserved to the States or the people of the States respectively.

Then, if it be true that the qualification which an elector is to have to choose the most numerous branch of the State Legislature is to be prescribed by the State, what authority has Congress to interfere with it, and what has been the practical operation? I never heard it intimated, until the intimation fell from the honorable member from Massachusetts, that any authority under the Government of the United States existed to that extent. What have the western States done? Many of them have admitted to the right of suffrage other than citizens; they have given it to male inhabitants. All of them almost—and that statement is equally applicable to some of the original States—have given it exclusively only to persons of a particular race, the white race, excluding the black. New York does it; Vermont does it; Connecticut does it; Michigan does it; Illinois does it; Ohio does it; Nevada does it; California does it; Maryland does it; and nearly all the States; and nobody ever supposed that they had not the power to exclude the black race, or any portion of the white race that they might think proper in the exercise of their sovereign power to exclude. In other words, the entire authority is in the people of the State, and it is for the people of the State to say who shall exercise the right of suffrage; and it would be monstrous to hold that, because they admitted or excluded any portion of the people of their State into or from the exercise of the right of suffrage, their government was not republican in point of form.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to ask the Senator a question if he will allow me.

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. POWELL. I fully concur with the honorable Senator from Maryland when he asserts that the people of a State, in the exercise of their sovereignty, and they alone, have the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters. I now wish to know by what authority General Banks and the President undertook to prescribe the qualifications of voters in Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought I had anticipated that in the beginning. I did not put it on the ground of General Banks's proceeding. What I mean to say is that these 11,414 voters were, according to the proof before us, all loyal men and entitled to vote by the original constitution of Louisiana, no matter how they were brought together; whether they were brought together under the authority of the President's amnesty proclamation, or whether they were brought together at the instance and authority of General Banks, in my view, makes no difference. If, coming together, they did an act which they would have been authorized to do if they had come together voluntarily, we ought to receive them.

Mr. POWELL. Allow me to ask the Senator, what right have we to presume that there may not have been twelve thousand loyal voters in the State of Louisiana who were deprived of the right of suffrage because of this order of General Banks? As I understand it, no person could vote in Louisiana, no matter how loyal, although he might have borne arms for the Union and been opposed to the confederate government all the time and always been for the old flag and the old Union, unless he would go forward and take the oath prescribed by the President and swear to support and sustain all proclamations in regard to African slavery already issued and all that might afterward be issued.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a difficulty, I admit; I have always felt it; but we have had the same difficulty in Maryland, and a very much stronger one, and I should be very sorry to think Maryland is not in the Union.

Mr. POWELL. Maryland is in the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is? The constitution which now makes her a State in the Union was adopted the other day; I mean the one which governs her. She has manumitted her slaves by force of that constitution. No man in Maryland seriously contests the obligation of that constitution in that particular or any other. But it was adopted, in fact, by the exclusion of a good many men who were entitled to vote. But we must stop somewhere; there must be an end to controversy at some time. We are not to be in a state of war forever; and I say in relation to Louisiana what I have said in relation to my own State, that it is better to let them in than to continue or to inaugurate a state of civil war by keeping them out, or by denying the authority of the constitution which they have thought proper to adopt.

Mr. President, the honorable member from Michigan has asked, what is a State? It has several meanings. It may mean the authority which composes the State; it may mean its peculiar organization of government; but there is one meaning which nobody has ever controverted to be a legitimate meaning, and that is, that it means the people of the State; and when we are called upon to decide whether a constitution has been adopted by the people of a State, and it becomes necessary to ascertain which of the people of a State should be permitted to adopt a constitution under the circumstances, and we are satisfied that it has been adopted by such a vote as this, I am not for excluding them on the ground that there was a much larger vote in 1860 than the one cast in 1864; first, because it by no means follows that because the vote was larger in 1860 than this, it is larger now; and secondly, and mainly, because all the evidence before the committee leads to the conclusion that almost every vote cast was a loyal vote, and that the votes not cast either did not exist in point of fact or included persons who ought not to vote on a question like that, being at war with the United States.

Again, Mr. President, are these States to be governed as provinces? That is the idea of the honorable member from Massachusetts. If so there is no limitation to the power of Congress. If they are to be considered as conquered provinces, or as provinces about to be conquered, and to be dealt with by the conqueror as he thinks proper, what is to become of the loyal citizens? What is to be their fate? Where are all the limitations thrown around the power of Congress? All gone. Are they to be governed as Territories in the sense in which the Territories of the United States are governed? Are you to give them territorial governments? Suppose you do, is that to take from the people the right to meet in convention and establish a constitution for themselves without a law of Congress authorizing it? Certainly not. It is the American doctrine that the people have a right, as against the Government, to meet and establish a government for themselves. Whether it complies with the requisitions of the Constitution when they afterward apply for admission into the Union as a State, Congress is to decide; but Congress when it does decide admits them into the Union on an equality with all the other States, and that equality does not exist unless you leave to them the right to change their State constitution from time to time as they may think the necessities of the State require.

The honorable member from Massachusetts has laid upon the table this morning an amendment consisting of nine sections, which I have read hastily, but I believe I understand their result; the first is, that Congress alone has the power to say who shall be permitted to reorganize the State governments; the second is, that in the exertion of that power it is to see that the constitution be republican in point of form; the third is, that it is not republican in point of form, either because of the truths declared in the Declaration of Independence or upon principles of justice independent of those truths, unless the blacks and the whites are given equally the right of suffrage. That is a most extraordinary doctrine, and where would it lead if true? Suppose the honorable member got the State of Louisiana back under the authority of an act of Congress such as he would draw, saying to that people, "You are authorized to frame a constitution for yourselves provided you will insert in it a clause that the right of suffrage shall be exercised by the black as well as the white," and they are admitted, does he think it would not be in the power of the people of Louisiana to change that afterward? What is Massachusetts authorized to do now? Will the honorable member deny that it would be in the power of Massachusetts now to exclude the black? I suppose not; and yet, if by an act of Congress you place it out of the power of the seceded States when they come back, under the authority of that act, to change the qualifications of electors, they will not come back as the equals of Massachusetts. And yet nothing is more plain than that the theory of our Constitution is (no matter whether you consider it as a national Government, a consolidated Government, or a consolidated Union) that the States, with reference to the powers that the original States possessed, are all equal. With just as much propriety could you deny to either of these States the authority to come back unless they would surrender every other sovereign right belonging to a State.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the Ordinance governing the Northwest Territory, prohibiting slavery everywhere throughout that Territory, and which was declared to be a perpetual compact, could be set aside by any one of the States in the territory now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly think they can, except so far as rights are vested.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator then thinks Ohio can enslave a fellow-man?

Mr. JOHNSON. Just as much as Massachusetts can.

Mr. SUMNER. Massachusetts cannot.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not?

Mr. SUMNER. Massachusetts cannot do an act of injustice.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, indeed! I did not know that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator ought to know it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think that is in the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it is in the constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. The United States Constitution, or your State constitution?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir; in our State constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it is not in the constitution of your people. You sometimes do, or have done, acts of injustice. What I mean to say is this, and I am sure the honorable member will not be able successfully to controvert it, certainly not by authority—that there is no difference between the State of Massachusetts and any other State in the Union with reference to its State powers. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. SUMNER. I mean to say that the State of Massachusetts has no power to do an act of wrong—no power constitutionally, morally, politically, or in any way.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is an act of wrong? Who is to judge of it?

Mr. SUMNER. To enslave a fellow-man.

Mr. JOHNSON. You had them there.

Mr. SUMNER. Not since the constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was not abolished by force of the constitution, by any manner of means. But there are other acts that Massachusetts has done—and I am the last man in the world to find fault with the moral or political status of Massachusetts—she has done a great many things that perhaps would not stand the test of very strict morality. She has in former times stood by and not prohibited the slave trade. She gave the vote which denied to Congress the authority to prohibit the slave trade for twenty years, united in that particular with the State of South Carolina. Was that right?

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so, too; but still it was legal. I am speaking of the existence of the power. It was power improperly exerted; but the men by whom that Constitution was established, Washington at their head, and southern men, too, for the most part, although violently opposed to the existence of that privilege for twenty years, yielded their opposition for the purpose of bringing about the Union. The man who spoke oftenest against it was Mr. Madison; and yet his advice was overruled, and South Carolina and Massachusetts are answerable mainly for the existence of that provision.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to interfere between the Senators, but upon this point, with the permission of the Senator of Maryland, I desire to show, from the constitution of Massachusetts, that it would be utterly impossible to get many votes among the Louisiana negroes at the present time, if the provisions of that constitution were applicable to them. I read an amendment to the constitution of Massachusetts now in force:

ART. 20. No person shall have the right to vote, or to be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth, who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requisitions, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any persons who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would exclude a good many.

Mr. HENDERSON. It would exclude nearly every negro in Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, Mr. President, the result to which I come is, that if a State was brought back under such a law as is suggested by the honorable member from Massachusetts, it would not accomplish his purpose; it could be changed the next day. It is a very easy thing for the honorable member from Massachusetts to say, and for the State of Massachusetts to say, that the negroes who are there, and who can read and write, shall vote, because there are very few there. It does not make a pin's difference whether they vote or not, so far as the result of their elections are concerned; but if they had thrown upon them the negro population of Louisiana, lost in ignorance, divested more or less of moral sense, because of the horrid condition in which they have been kept, knowing not what the laws of God require, because they have been kept in a state of ignorance—if they were all assembled within the limits of Massachusetts, does not everybody know that there is no State in the Union that would exclude them more certainly than Massachusetts?

Why, sir, look at the State of Maryland. Maryland, by the constitution which she has just adopted, emancipates all her slaves, and without compensation; but she does not admit them to vote. They are excluded; and what would be the result if they were not excluded? There were seventy or eighty thousand free negroes in the State when the Constitution was adopted, and over seventy thousand slaves; altogether one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty thousand Africans; about one third of the whole population of the State. To suffer them to vote would be to control absolutely the intelligence of the State; to place us in the hands of an ignorant population; ignorant not because, perhaps, of any natural defect; ignorant not because of any fault of their own; ignorant because of the unhappy condition in which they have been placed. But that gives them no right to vote; because it would subject the State itself to very serious embarrassment, and perhaps to destruction.

But when the honorable member says that all these blacks should be entitled to vote he ought to consider for a moment. They are about organizing some two hundred thousand negro soldiers in the army of the rebellion. They are now being drilled preparatory to the authority to bring them into the service. One of the houses of that supposed congress has adopted it by a vote approaching almost unanimity. The Senate rejected it in the first instance by a majority of more than two thirds. It was defeated only a few days ago by a majority of one; and everybody knows that they are about to authorize it. They will have from two to three hundred thousand in the rebel service. The honorable member thinks not. That is a difference of opinion between him and those by whom the negroes are better known, perhaps. I doubt it; that is to say, I doubt whether they will be true to that flag; but they may hold out temptations to them which will make them true.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator think they can organize two hundred thousand negroes?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so, because they think so. Why not?

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think as they do.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know you do not, and I do not think you have ever done so; but that does not necessarily show that they are wrong. But suppose it is done, what are you going to do with those negroes when they come back? Would you let them vote? or will you treat them just as you treat the disloyal whites? Will you not treat them as traitors? They are traitors. I have endeavored to satisfy the Senate, and I believe the Senate are generally of the opinion, that they do owe allegiance to the United States, and may be made soldiers of to protect the United States; but if they raise their arms against the United States they are as much guilty of treason as the white man. They will stand in need of the President's amnesty proclamation; and if the President shall, and no doubt he would, protect them by pardoning them, I want to know from the honorable member whether he would let them vote.

Mr. President, the idea that under the Constitution of the United States you can interfere with any of the rights of the States is an idea first started in the last two or three years. The consolidation to which the honorable member referred last night, to be found mentioned in the letter of General Washington presenting the proceedings of the Convention to the several Legislatures, was not the consolidation that is in the mind of the honorable member. All that he meant was that the Union existing under the Articles of Confederation was made a stronger and more consolidated Union than it was under those Articles.

Mr. SUMNER. Has the Senator the text before him?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, I have not.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it, and if the Senator has no objection, I will read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not the slightest.

Mr. SUMNER. The language of Washington is as follows. It is in his letter bearing date September 17, 1787, addressed to the Congress of the United States, and covering the Constitution as adopted by the Convention. He says:

"It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance as on the object to be obtained."

He then goes on, toward the close, as follows:

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

Mr. JOHNSON. • That is to say, to strengthen the Union; to render its destruction almost impossible.

Mr. SUMNER. Absolutely impossible.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it is not impossible. It has been tried, and we are now trying to preserve it. But does the honorable member mean to say that General Washington, by that letter, intended to announce as the true doctrine of the Constitution that the Government was a consolidated Government in the ordinary acceptance of the term, and invested with all the powers which belong to one single Government? I am sure he does not mean that.

Mr. SUMNER. I rather think that the first time this word was used in our country was by Washington, and therefore whatever meaning it has must be found in his text. He uses the term, "the consolidation of our Union." I am not aware that it was used before, and so far as it has been used since it has been a quotation from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member is sincere (and I have no right to doubt his sincerity) in supposing that Washington intended by that expression to announce as the true theory of the Constitution that the Government of the Union was one Government, possessed with all the powers of Government, belonging to one single Government, he is at war with the acts of General Washington. When the first act of incorporation from the United States was projected by Hamilton and was finally passed by Congress he called for the opinion of his several Cabinet advisers. He had but ten days. He received Mr. Jefferson's letter upon the subject advising against its approval upon the want of Constitutional authority to pass it, and it so startled him that he was about to affix his negative, and but the day before—I speak from what I have heard, and what I am sure is true from the manner in which the fact has come to me—but the day before he announced to Mr. Hamilton his very great apprehension that if he approved that bill he would violate the Constitution of the United States, and Mr. Hamilton on the preceding evening of his approval sat down in his own house in Philadelphia at eight o'clock in the afternoon, and there he remained upon his seat until the sunlight came in writing the report which satisfied Washington that Congress had the authority to establish a corporation. It is obvious he could not have doubted upon that question at all if he had considered that the Government of the United States was a consolidated Government in the sense in which the honorable member understands it.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I understand it only in the sense of Washington, that is all.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is begging the question. I do not know that the honorable member knows how Washington understood it better than anybody else; and what did he mean is the question. What I mean to say is this: that he could not have meant what the honorable member seems to suppose he did mean, because, if he did, he never would have hesitated about the authority of Congress to charter a corporation.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator from Maryland will permit me, I will read a former part of the letter of Washington which the Senator from Massachusetts failed to read, showing what General Washington meant when he used the term "consolidation of our Union:"

"The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, peace, and treaties, that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union; but the impropriety of delegating such extensive trusts to one body of men."

As was done under the Articles of Confederation—

"is evident: hence results the necessity of a different organization."

Meaning the Government now formed by the Constitution.

"It is obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States"—

Says General Washington—

"to secure the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all."

Alluding to the old Articles of Confederation:

"Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to situation, extent, habits, and particular interests."

Then it is that he says:

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the debates in the Convention, and the debates in the several State conventions to which the Constitution was submitted, all show that they considered it a mere delegated Government with certain limited powers, though to the extent of the delegation the supremacy of the United States existed. Here is what Mr. Madison says upon the effect of consolidation:

"That the obvious tendency and inevitable result of a consolidation of the States into one sovereignty would be to transform the republican system of the United States into a monarchy, is a point that seems to have been sufficiently attested by the general sentiment of America."

One word more, sir, and I have done. If Congress passes this resolution, and the State is admitted, no court will hereafter be able to decide that she is not a State in the Union, and no court therefore can call in question the validity or effect of any provision to be found in her constitution. One of the provisions of this constitution is that all the slaves of Louisiana are emancipated. Pass this resolution, admit the State, and that provision is effectual at once. The courts will decide that whether the State has a constitution republican in form or not, and should be admitted, is a political question, and as Congress in the case supposed has decided it by admitting the State under this constitution, the courts will hold that emancipation in Louisiana is effectual. How will it be otherwise, if you keep the State out? Then whether those negroes are emancipated or not will depend upon the President's proclamation; and very few lawyers, as far as I know, very few judges—certainly the President thought it would not have that effect—are of opinion that that proclamation has any effect at all as a mere proclamation. It operates to the extent that our forces have got possession of the territory and the negroes have come within the lines; but its operation beyond the lines is much more than doubtful. My own individual opinion is that the courts will all decide that the proclamation to that extent is a nullity, or, in the language of the President, as futile as the bull against the comet.

Mr. CARLILE. I will ask the Senator how much further beyond our military lines will this constitution of Louisiana operate than the President's proclamation?

Mr. JOHNSON. It operates in point of law. If you admit the State under this constitution you say that this is the law of Louisiana, and nobody can contest it. The judiciary are bound to act in obedience to the political department of the Government after that department shall have acted; and the moment you admit Louisiana into this Union you give as much effect to the emancipating clause to be found in that constitution as has the emancipation clause to be found in the recent constitution of Maryland. It operates proprio vigore, and the courts will not permit you to go beyond it for the purpose of ascertaining whether the constitution was adopted or not. They will say that was a matter for Congress, and Congress has decided it.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator from Maryland, who now calls in question the validity of the proclamation of emancipation, question that the Supreme Court of the United States, with its present Chief Justice, would affirm the complete validity of that proclamation everywhere within the rebel States strictly according to its letter?

Mr. JOHNSON. If I am perfectly satisfied, as I am, that the Chief Justice is abundantly capable of filling the high office he has, I do not think he would; but whether he would or not does not settle the question what the court would do. He is but one of ten. Does the honorable member suppose there is anything so towering in the genius and learning of the Chief Justice (and I value them just as much as he does) that he can bring a controlling influence upon the other nine members of the tribunal and cause them to forget what they have said from time to time analogically? I believe as firmly as I believe in my existence, that if the question of the effect of that proclamation was brought up in a legitimate case before the Supreme Court to-morrow, the court would be unanimous in deciding that it has no operation. If there could be any dissent, it could only be in the opinion of the Chief Justice; and I only assume that because the honorable member from Massachusetts, who is very intimate with him, seems to think that he might perhaps be relied upon to hold such a doctrine.

Mr. President, southern man as I am, and unwilling to interfere with the rights of the South, as I have ever been, anxious to-day to have the Union preserved just as it existed, believing that the time would come when the institution of slavery would cease to exist by State operation, that the people could be brought to the conviction that it was not only a high moral duty, but that in a pecuniary sense it was to their advantage, and in a political sense to their advantage, I am now anxious, and have been almost from the beginning of the rebellion, certainly for the last year or two, that this terrible topic of discussion should be removed at once and forever by a measure the constitutionality and effect of which nobody can question. Sir, I think I see that if Louisiana or any of these States were brought back with slavery the scenes we have had in this Chamber before would be witnessed again. We should have no peace, in the general acceptance of that term; no such quiet as exists now in a great measure in this Chamber; we would be quarreling upon this subject; the public mind would continue to be excited to the last, until sooner or later another rebellion would spring forth. I believe as firmly as I believe in my existence, that with slavery gone, and the authority of the Union reinstated all over the land, that authority will never hereafter be questioned; and it will go on in a career of prosperity which even our own example will be seen to fall far short of. But the honorable member from Massachusetts by his course, as I think—of course he does not intend it—keeps the topic before us everlastingly. First he is for abolishing slavery by presidential proclamation. But he is not satisfied with relying upon that: he is for abolishing it by congressional legislation. He is not satisfied with that: he is for providing that these States shall not be brought back into the Union unless they will agree not only at the time they are brought back, but forever, to give to the black race the right of suffrage. I say to the honorable Senator, if he expects to keep the agitation up, and the Union broken as it is, until that is accomplished, he will not live to see the day when the Union is restored.

It was not my purpose, Mr. President, to submit more than the very desultory remarks with which I have troubled the Senate; but I shall rely upon them as justifying the vote which I propose to give in favor of this resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I have an amendment to offer, to insert the following proviso at the end of the resolution:

Provided, That this shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the electoral franchise, or of any other rights on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law. And the Legislature of the State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of such assent whenever the same shall be adopted, upon the receipt whereof he shall, by proclamation, announce the fact; whereupon, without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, this joint resolution shall take effect.

This amendment will explain itself. If Senators have listened to it they will be able to act upon it without any debate or any further suggestion from me. But I desire to call attention simply to the precedent on which it is founded, and I am induced to do so the more from the very elaborate way in which the Senator from Maryland has seemed to anticipate it. He has announced that any such proposition would be perfectly futile. Sir, those who preceded us in these Chambers in some of the good days of the Republic did not think so. I have before me the third volume of the Statutes at Large, page 645, where you will find a resolution, adopted March 2, 1821, which I believe was introduced by Henry Clay, and which was the final ground of reconciliation between conflicting opinions in these two Chambers, as follows:

Resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, on a certain condition.

*Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: *Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.

I have modeled the proviso which I have sent to the Chair on this identical resolution, following as near as possible its precise language.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to correct a mistake into which the Senator from Massachusetts has fallen. He speaks of that resolution as introduced by Mr. Clay. Mr. Clay never introduced it.

Mr. DAVIS. I was just going to set the Senator from Massachusetts right on that point.

Mr. POWELL. I am not sure who it was, but I think it was introduced by a gentleman from Illinois. I know it has been imputed to Mr. Clay.

Mr. DAVIS. That resolution was introduced by Jesse D. Thomas, a Senator from Illinois. It was voted for, however, by Mr. Clay.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, sir; it is not of much importance who introduced it. Suffice it to say that this resolution is in the statutes of the country, and it was adopted at the time by a large vote. This was not, you will understand, the bill which so agitated these two Chambers, and which was the subject of such extensive discussion. It was the final resolution under which Missouri at last took her place in the Congress of the United States, and by that resolution there was affixed to her reception a fundamental condition. Mark the energy of the expression—"a fundamental condition." Missouri accepted the resolution, and by what was called "a solemn public act" declared her acceptance; and then it was that the President of the United States, by his proclamation, declared that Missouri was a State in the Union. Now, sir, I propose to append to this joint resolution a proviso which is founded on that resolution, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "race," the words "or sex."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The first question, I presume, will be on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment by inserting the words "or sex."

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend there will be scarcely time to call the yeas and nays before the time arrives for taking a recess; but I wish to say to the Senate before the recess is taken that I trust we may be able to conclude this matter to-night, and I hope that Senators will return and let us stay this evening and hear all that the Senator from Massachusetts has to say, and vote upon all his amendments. I think there is no other way to dispose of this matter than to hold on to it, and as we shall probably have to have a night session at some time I trust Senators will attend this evening, and that we may finally dispose of it. I desire to submit a few remarks on the subject before it finally passes from the attention of the Senate. However, I shall be governed very much by the condition of the resolution. I think that the facts upon which the report of the committee has been made have not been properly understood, or, if understood, have not been properly represented to the Senate. When the facts are properly before the Senate, I for one, certainly, shall have no feeling as to what disposition may be made of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour fixed by the Senate having arrived, the Senate will take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 463) for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITION.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States recognizing the obligations of the Christian religion; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 476) to provide for a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the Armies of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

J. AND O. P. COBB AND COMPANY.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, to call up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) for the relief of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana.

Mr. CLARK. I am entirely agreed, if it will give rise to no debate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it will.

Mr. TRUMBULL. All this, I take it, is done by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 80.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) for the adjustment of the claim of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire merely to say this: the Committee agreed to the right and propriety of the resolution as it came from the House, but thought it best to divide the claim. It seems to me that is unnecessary, and I hope the Senate will not do so, but will pass the resolution as it came from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the resolution after the word "order" in the eighth line, in the following words:

Of their barges and other vessels employed in the shipment of hay to Memphis, Tennessee, under a contract with the Government of the United States, and the hay on board of said vessels, which was being shipped by said firm in the fulfillment of said contract, and other property connected with and being used in the fulfillment of said contract, the said property having been burned and destroyed by the United States gunboat No. 33; and that he allow the said claimants the value of said property, not exceeding $11,000, to be paid out of any money heretofore or hereafter appropriated, applicable to the payment of claims against the quartermaster's bureau.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Of a certain quantity of hay loaded by them on certain barges and flatboats, on the Ohio river, to be delivered at Memphis, Tennessee, under a contract with the Government of the United States; and that he allow the said claimants the contract price of said hay so destroyed, less the expense of transportation from the place where destroyed to the place of delivery, to be paid out of any money heretofore or hereafter appropriated, applicable to the payment of claims against the quartermaster's bureau.

So that the resolution will read:

That the Quartermaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the claim of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana, for the loss sustained by them on the 11th and 12th days of July, 1863, of the destruction, by military order, of a certain quantity of hay loaded by them on certain barges, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose most Senators recollect the point. It is whether the boats that carried the hay shall be excluded, or whether they shall be included in the claim. The House included the boats that carried the hay as well as the hay, and the Senate Committee on Claims divided it so as to present the question to the Senate. I hope the resolution as it passed the House will pass here.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I remember the case, it is to pay for property that was destroyed before the Government of the United States received it.

Mr. CLARK. The Government destroyed it themselves.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, there are thousands and millions of dollars' worth of property that has been destroyed by the Government, and if we commence paying for that class of cases we shall have very large claims here.

Mr. CLARK. We have got to pay for some of them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there is any obligation of contract to pay for this claim, I should like to know why it does not go to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims would have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. CLARK. I doubt whether the Court of Claims could take jurisdiction of it, or whether they could adjudicate upon it, from the fact that the hay was not delivered; the Government destroyed it before it could be delivered at the place of contract. There is no question as to the justice of the claim at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there any question as to the justice of any of these claims for property belonging to loyal citizens of the United States which has been destroyed? And yet we have abstained from passing any law thus far to pay for that property. Right across the Potomac here hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth, and I suppose millions, of property in sight of this Capitol, has been destroyed by the Union Army, some of it belonging to Union people, and yet we have not paid for that property. If you are going to commence the principle now on this little claim, they will all come in.

Mr. CLARK. It is very true this is the first case of the kind; it is very true there may be a great many claims of this kind; but that should not deter the Government, in the judgment of the committee, from commencing at some time and being just to these claimants. We cannot refuse them all. The committee, so far, have delayed action to know what might be the sense of the Senate, and they presented this claim in the way that they did, proposing to strike out a portion of it, in order to bring the question directly before the Senate. The Senate seem to think by rejecting the amendment that the whole of the claim should be paid; or, at least, that one part of it does not stand on better ground than the other. I think so myself, if the Senate choose to enter upon this class of cases. They must enter upon them at some time, and I do not see why we may not begin in those cases that are very meritorious and urgent, and where the evidence is entirely clear. There are many cases that may be rejected for want of evidence or want of merit, but a great many have merit. There is one other case that the committee have reported at this session to which I wish to ask their attention when I have the opportunity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to this class of cases. He is the guardian of the Treasury here. I wish to say to him that we shall have to raise $1,000,000,000 more than is provided for if the principle laid down in this resolution is to be adopted. The Senator from New Hampshire now avows that this is the first case of the kind to establish the principle; and the principle is this, that the Government of the United States is to pay for all the property that its armies have destroyed. If the Government of the United States is to pay for the property that its armies have taken and destroyed in the State of Missouri, in the State of Kentucky, in the State of Tennessee, and all these States, there will be no end to the amount of damages and claims that will be presented against this Government.

Mr. COWAN. Are not the Court of Claims paying for them now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; the Court of Claims are paying for no property of this kind.

Mr. COWAN. I think they are.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. The law prohibits their paying for any case of damages for property destroyed by the Union armies. They only have jurisdiction of cases arising out of contracts.

Mr. COWAN. This arises out of a contract.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it belongs to the Court of Claims, and has no business here. If there is any contract on the part of the Government to pay for this property, let it go to the Court of Claims, where it can be investigated and both sides in the case can be heard, and not bring it here and establish the principle upon this little claim that the Government of the United States will pay for all the property that has been destroyed by the Union armies during this rebellion. There is no end to it if we commence.

Mr. CLARK. I do not quite like to be mis-stated, as I am by the Senator from Illinois, unintentionally, I have no doubt; but I have avowed no purpose of asking the Government to pay for all the property destroyed by the Union Army. There is a great portion destroyed in such a way that there would be no pretense for recovering payment for it; but when our Government take the property in such a way as to make them liable for it under the claim of property taken for the public use of the Government, they are bound to pay for it. That is what the Government have always held; what we held in the last war; what we have held ever since—that when property has been taken by the Government for public use; when it has been taken by military necessity, and destroyed to preserve our armies or advance our cause, then the Government must pay for it. Here was a necessity, as the military authorities thought, of destroying this property in order to catch John Morgan, who had gone over into the State of Ohio, to prevent his recrossing into Kentucky, and doing a vast deal of damage. In the judgment of the committee it may have been well that that property should be destroyed; it was an act of precaution, at any rate; and on every principle that has been adopted by the Government heretofore the Government are bound to pay for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Our armies thought it advisable to destroy Atlanta, and I have no doubt there will be parties there who will prove their loyalty. Our armies thought it advisable to fire shells into Charleston, and a great part of the city has been destroyed, destroyed for military purposes. Must we pay for this property or establish a principle that will require that we should pay for it? I think this bill had better be passed in a fuller Senate than this, and on the yeas and nays, if it is to pass at all. I desire to record my vote against it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am perfectly satisfied that the Senator from Illinois does not understand the merits of this claim. Cobb & Co. contracted to deliver a certain amount of hay at Vicksburg at a certain compensation per ton. They started to deliver that hay; and upon the river, before they reached the destination, it was seized by the military authorities of Kentucky and destroyed, the boats as well as the hay. They were in the completion of a contract with the Government, and before they reached the point of destination the Government seized it; and that was to all intents and purposes a delivery to the Government, for they placed it out of the power of the contractors to go further. They seized the boats, and seized the hay, and burned it up. It was a regular contract at a certain price per ton; and if there is a debt due upon earth, it is this contract of Cobb & Co. It does not depend upon the principle of general compensation for property destroyed at all. It was under a contract, and they were in transit. No part of it depends upon this principle of general compensation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then why not send it to the Court of Claims?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Because the Government seized it under a contract before it reached its destination; and the question is, whether it was delivered or not. That is the whole of it. It does not raise the question as to general compensation for property destroyed by the Government. It stands upon its own grounds so far as the hay is concerned. So far as the boats are concerned, if the Senate believe they should not pay for the boats, well and good; but there is no doubt but what the Government ought to pay for the hay that they had contracted for, and Cobb & Co. were trying to deliver and were prevented from delivering at Vicksburg, because the military authorities seized it and burned it up, so that the boats should not be used by John Morgan for the purpose of passing over the Ohio river. It does not depend upon any such principle of general compensation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on ordering the resolution to a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS. I move an amendment in the form of a substitute, to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That J. & O. P. Cobb, and all other loyal persons, natural or artificial, or any loyal State of the United States, who have or may hereafter have any debt, claim, or demand against the United States, originating out of any contract, express or implied, for the possession, occupation, appropriation, or conversion of any property, real, or personal, or mixed, by, under, or for the use or service of the United States, by the contract or act of any of its officers, agents, or employees, in the performance of their duties, may institute suit therefor against the United States in the proper district or circuit court thereof; and all such suits shall be heard, adjudged, and determined by the same principles, rules, and modes of proceedings as would be applicable to suits between private citizens in such courts.

Mr. President, I propose by this amendment to make the United States liable to individual citizens precisely as individual citizens are liable to each other, to the extent of a suit and a judgment. Why should it not be so? Why should not the United States pay all its debts originating in contract or in quasi contract, or for the destruction of the property of the citizen? Should the United States be less just than the individual citizen? Does not the United States owe to every loyal citizen thereof protection? Does not that term "protection" necessarily carry with it an obligation upon the part of the United States that such money as it may owe to any citizen, growing out of any of the class of cases specified in that amendment, should be paid by the United States? If there is any power in the land; if there is anybody, natural or artificial, in the land that ought to be entirely just, and that ought to be answerable by the law and the courts to all citizens for all such debts and liabilities as are specified in this amendment, the United States is precisely that artificial body that ought to meet this liability.

Sir, in my judgment, it has been a reproach, a crying injustice, a grievous oppression upon the part of the United States, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, that it has never allowed the citizen to bring suit against it, and to make the Government of the United States responsible just as one citizen is responsible to another. I have heard it said in past years, and I have no doubt it will be repeated, that the United States is not able to pay; that if the Government is allowed to be suable in the district courts, fictitious claims will be brought against it, and will be sustained by false testimony, and in that way the public Treasury will be plundered. My experience and conclusions are altogether different. I believe that if Congress was to pass a law authorizing the United States to be sued just as any other individual, and competent legal officers were appointed by the Government to protect its interests, and to make defense against unjust claims, a much smaller amount in the aggregate would be recovered against the Government than is now obtained by petitions and by bills passed by Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to appeal to my friend from Kentucky not to bury this little private claim by a general proposition which it is impossible for the Senate now to consider. I do not think it is just thus to destroy the prospects of the passage of a single claim that has undergone the forms of legislation up to this point by the introduction of a general proposition that it is impossible for the Senate now properly to consider. I do not think the Senator wishes to defeat a claim that he sees plainly is so obviously just and right. I appeal to him not to destroy it.

Mr. DAVIS. If I were at all convinced that the claim would pass the Senate I should not have proposed this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Suppose the Senator lets it be tried, and see whether it will be passed or not.

Mr. DAVIS. Are we not now in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is now in the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Besides, it is a House resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose this is the only opportunity I shall have of presenting the amendment during the session.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; there is another bill that has been reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. However, at the instance of the Senator from Indiana, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I listened to the debate the other day upon the subject of this claim, and did not intend to say a word, but simply to record my vote upon it. My vote will be based entirely upon this proposition: that there is no equitable or legal distinction between this case and a thousand others that I might give you that occurred in the States of Ohio and Indiana in the Morgan raid. In the State of Ohio horses were taken and appropriated, not only to the use of John Morgan and his thieves, but to the use of the Government of the United States. A commission was appointed by our State authorities to collect together all the various cases of property appropriated in the course of the Morgan raid, and they have sent us a statement exhibiting a loss of some four or five hundred thousand dollars. Every one of those cases presents just as strong and just as equitable a claim on this Government as the case now presented. I have declined, and have advised the State authorities not to present this claim against the national Government at this time; that Ohio is strong and able enough to carry forward this indebtedness, if it is an indebtedness against the Government, which I very much doubt, and that she ought not to present the claim; and the matter has been suspended ever since.

Here is the case of the property of private persons seized by the Government, and destroyed for what purpose? To keep it from being destroyed by the public enemy.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. CLARK. Not at all. Mr. SHERMAN. To keep it from being seized by the public enemy.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. CLARK. Not at all. Mr. SHERMAN. Or to keep the boats from being used by the public enemy to cross the Ohio river. Perhaps that is a statement which Senators will admit. At any rate, it is property destroyed to keep it out of the possession of the public enemy.

Mr. CLARK and Mr. HOWE. Not at all. Mr. SHERMAN. There is no other purpose, no other object. I have heard this statement made several times by Senators in advocating the claim. The military authorities were afraid that John Morgan would seize these boats and with them would cross the river and thus invade the State of Ohio and the State of Indiana.

Mr. CLARK. No; they were afraid he would take them and get back again.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the same thing. This property was seized to prevent it from falling into the hands of John Morgan. That is the long and the short of it. Now, suppose this hay had been shipped to some private individual, and had been destroyed by the Government in the course of that shipment, could these parties claim it? I think, according to the well-recognized principles of international law, they could not, and I do not see that the case is any stronger by the fact that this property was on its way to be delivered to the national Government. Suppose this property was to have been delivered to some private individual at Vicksburg, and the Government had found it necessary to seize that property and destroy it to prevent it from falling into the hands of a public enemy, would the Government be responsible in such a case? Look at the books on international law, and you will find that they are full of declarations that the Government is not responsible for property seized under those circumstances. If the Government seizes the property and applies it for the use of its troops, such as munitions of war, food, and the like, they are bound to pay for it; but if they destroy property of the private citizen, even of their own loyal citizens, for the purpose of preventing it from falling into the hands of the public enemy, the Government is not responsible; and that is on the ground, not that it is not just to pay for it, but on the ground that no Government can pay for it.

Mr. COWAN. The doctrine is the very reverse of that.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Ohio will find case after case, and case after case—the books are full of them—the very reverse of what he states.

Mr. DAVIS. The last case was decided by the Court of Claims at its last session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I am very much in error about it.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly you are.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think Senators will find that I lay down the principle correctly.

But, sir, I think it improper and unjust for the Government of the United States to take up individual cases and pay them as they are presented, without any general system. I am disposed to postpone all these claims, to postpone the claim of my own State, many of the damages and losses of which occurred almost under my own eye; to postpone them all until some future period. I know that this is a very hard case on the contractors who were endeavoring to perform their contract, taking the hay down to Vicksburg; but it was no harder than thousands of others that occurred during the Morgan raid, and are occurring now every day in Kentucky, and other States of the Union, where property is seized by the Government of the United States and destroyed for military purposes, for military defense, or to prevent it from being seized and destroyed by the public enemy.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that this resolution and case be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will not be done, because at the last session of Congress, I think, Congress passed a law by which it was declared expressly that this class of cases should not go to the Court of Claims, desiring to retain them in their own hands. Unless Congress desire to set the example and let this class of cases go to the Court of Claims, this had better not be done; but if they intend to set the example, and to let all this class of cases go there, and thus furnish a tribunal to which this class of cases can go, I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is taking up so much time that I must call for the order of the evening. This resolution was taken up by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order of the day being called for, the unfinished business must be taken up.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 117) to recognize the State government of Louisiana, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON to the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the time the Senate took a recess the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] was upon the floor, and the Chair does not know whether the Senator intended to continue his remarks or not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I intended to say something upon this question at some time, but not at this time if any one else is prepared to go on. Having reported the resolution to the Senate, it was my intention to say a few words in the conclusion of the debate. If any other Senator desires to say anything I hope he will proceed; if not, I will make the few remarks I desire to make, and then I hope we shall get a vote.

Mr. CLARK. With the assent of the Senator from Illinois I will submit the reason which will govern my own vote to the Senate at this time and on this question, and I shall be very brief, because I desire, as well as the Senator from Illinois, and I do not doubt other Senators, that we should have action on this resolution to-night. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I desire to say in regard to that amendment, that I approve of its general features; that is, I approve of the extension of the elective franchise to people who are qualified for it otherwise, without regard to color. I like the provision of the constitution of Massachusetts, that the men who are qualified by their intelligence shall be the voters.

Mr. POMEROY. I will inquire of the Senator if he intends to convey the idea that it is a crime not to be able to read and write.

Mr. CLARK. I did not say that it was.

Mr. POMEROY. But you will not permit a man to enjoy the elective franchise unless he can read and write; and the man who is so unfortunate as not to have had opportunity to learn to read and write at an early day is to be deprived of the right of voting for all time to come.

Mr. CLARK. Then from the necessity of the case I would give him every opportunity to learn to read and write.

Mr. POMEROY. There are thousands of good and loyal men who cannot read and write.

Mr. CLARK. I have not any doubt of it, and they are the men who have been deceived by the men who had an interest to deceive them. I say I approve that principle.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not.

Mr. CLARK. I am not saying I would adopt it; but I say to the Senator from Kansas, and I say here in the Senate, that if that principle were adopted, it would be a grand inducement to all these men to learn to read and write who now neglect it.

Mr. POMEROY. It is a wrong principle to discriminate against a man who has been unfortunate.

Mr. CLARK. I do not propose to discriminate against a man who has been unfortunate. I merely say I like the principle of having voters qualified in that sense. I should like to have them qualified in the sense that the justice of the peace was going to be qualified in my country. When he got his commission and one of his neighbors asked him if he was qualified, he said no, he did not suppose he was, but he was going to get a book, and should be soon. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, I am against this amendment as it now stands, because it is an amendment to this resolution which proposes to recognize the government in the State of Louisiana, which is a State in my judgment, still a State in the Union, having its constitution overthrown, but desiring and attempting to establish a new constitution; and I hold that we have no power to amend that constitution; and that is the reason why I shall be obliged to vote against it here.

Having said this much in regard to the amendment, desiring to be brief, I will submit a remark or two in regard to the general question, and then have done, that I may not occupy the attention of the Senate but once.

I suppose that everybody in the Senate will agree with me that the rebels ought not to be allowed to vote; that the man who has rebelled against the Government and made war upon it should not exercise the elective franchise. I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] would agree to that. I think my other friend from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] would agree that they ought not to vote. We know that there were a great many rebels in the State of Louisiana. We will all be agreed, then, that they ought not to vote. But the fact shows that there were Union men, too, in the State of Louisiana. They ought not to be deprived of the right of voting because the rebels did wrong, and if the rebels in the State cannot vote I hold that the Union people may vote, and the management and control of the government of that State belongs to the Union people. I am not aware that there is any distinct number of people required to constitute a State. We admit States with a population of sixty thousand, seventy thousand, eighty thousand, and when once admitted, so long as there are people enough in the State to hold and exercise the government, it is still a State.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And to elect two members of Congress?

Mr. CLARK. The Constitution provides that they shall have one, at least. I am not arguing now or attempting to show that they are entitled to one, two, or three members of Congress. I am arguing upon the point that they are entitled to exercise the right of suffrage in the State of Louisiana, notwithstanding a certain proportion of the people may have gone into rebellion. If the rebels cannot vote, it will remain to the Union people to exercise the rights of State sovereignty in that State.

As I was saying, if the population should be reduced in a State, say from one hundred thousand to five thousand, it would still be a State. So if the population of a State be reduced by rebels who have forfeited their right to vote, it will still be a State for the Union people remaining in it, and the question then will be whether a majority of the Union people have exercised the right; and that is the question here as I understand it. I do not understand, as the Senator from Michigan does, that because a majority of the people of Louisiana have gone into rebellion, that therefore they have taken away the rights of the minority who were Union people. That cannot be. I contend, on the other hand, that it is so much the more our duty to protect that minority.

And here I desire to meet the argument that has been suggested, that this government of Louisiana is a very feeble power, a shadowy government, as some call it. Why, sir, as I understand it, the provision of the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty a republican form of government to every State was made to meet just such a case; where the people themselves could not maintain and control, or were not disposed to maintain and control, a form of republican government, that there the United States should guaranty it. There is another provision of the Constitution, that upon the call of the Legislature of a State, or of the Executive when the Legislature is not in session, the General Government shall protect a State against domestic violence; and that was meant to protect a State so feeble that it could not protect itself. The very supposition that upon the call of the Legislature or the Executive of the State the United States Government should protect it, presupposes that it is a weak government and cannot protect itself. I hold that if this republican government in the State of Louisiana is a small one, or is a feeble one, it is the duty of the Government so much the more to sustain and protect it as the nucleus of loyal feeling and loyal sentiment in that country.

Sir, I am not afraid to recognize that government for fear that it will be overborne, if the Government of the United States protect it and stand by it. It is no more likely to be overborne in that case than it would be if the Government did not stand by it, and you had to hold that country by the military power, so far as to keep the rebels off the Union people; and it is a duty you owe the Union people. I hold that the Union people of Louisiana have a right to appeal to the force of the General Government and ask protection; and I hold that you do not render them your full duty unless you do protect them. It is not only a question of policy, but it is a question of duty for us—a duty we owe to that loyal people, or to the remains of the people in the State who are loyal, to protect them there; and therefore, Mr. President, not to be tedious, I shall give my vote for the measure before the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I appear to have been entirely misunderstood in the remark I made, by the Senator from New Hampshire. I only intended to reply in a single word that what he admired so much in that article that was read as being a portion of the constitution of Massachusetts did not as cordially commend itself to my mind as it did to his. That article provides that before a man can vote he must be able to read and write the Constitution of the United States in English. There are thousands of men who can read and write very well, but not a word of English.

Mr. CLARK. I did not say to the Senate that I admired the provision of the Massachusetts constitution. I like the feature of it in this, that a man shall read and write and understand what he is about. That is all I mean to say.

Mr. POMEROY. It is very desirable for everybody to read and write, but there are other languages beside the English that can be learned, in which a man can read and write and be very well educated. The point I make is this: that in all the States, and especially in the new States on the border, many men have not had an opportunity to learn to read and write the English language, or perhaps any language, and I do not believe that, because they have not had the opportunity, and are unable to read and write in the English language, therefore they should be disfranchised. It is a misfortune that they feel; but it is nothing for which they should be punished; it is nothing for which they should be driven away from the ballot-box or the jury-box. Many of them are business men, men of good standing and character, patriotic and loyal. I have been surprised in looking over the pay-rolls of the Army to see how many soldiers we had that could not sign the pay-rolls, and not only soldiers, but officers; and yet, sir, I would be very slow in passing a law that should disfranchise them, and should prevent them, after they had fought and bled for their country, from enjoying all the rights of citizens.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I usually vote for everything that the Senator from Massachusetts brings forward on the anti-slavery question; but I am opposed to this amendment, in the first place, because I do not suppose that we have the right to say what shall be the qualifications of voters in any State in the Union. The people of my own State are supposed to be loyal. They are as radical as are the citizens of Massachusetts, but they are not loyal enough to allow Congress to dictate to them what kind of qualifications for voting they shall have.

Mr. SUMNER. The people of Kansas have never rebelled.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe they have never rebelled, although many of us, and I for one, have been indicted for treason and sentenced in a United States court. We were supposed to be in rebellion at one time; but yet Congress never undertook to dictate to us what should be the qualifications of our voting when we did have the right to vote. There were some years when we could not vote. For one, sir, I am for leaving this question of suffrage to the citizens of the States, and I claim it as their right to admit whoever they choose to the ballot-box. I am not loyal enough myself to allow my own rights as a citizen of a State to be trampled upon in that way. I would not be dictated to, as a citizen of a sovereign State, by Congress or any other power as to what kind of citizens of my State should be allowed to vote. If they choose to let all the citizens, including the women, vote, it is not a matter for Congress to interfere with. The citizens of a State are not confined to its male citizens, either white or black, and the right of voting does not while the right of citizenship. The States have their own way about that. Some States let one class of persons vote, and some another, and I want that course continued.

I do not desire to continue this discussion. I would rather come to a vote. But so far as I am concerned, I shall vote against all amendments that look like dictation on the part of Congress to any State whether they will let the right of suffrage be enjoyed by a whole or a part of the people.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before my honorable friend from Kansas takes his seat I wish to propound a question to him. I understood him to say that he, as a citizen of a State, would not allow dictation from Congress, or any other power, as to his right of voting, or the right of any citizen of his State.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir, that is it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then the question I wish to propound to the honorable Senator is this: if he had lived in my State a year ago last fall, and he had seen the armed soldiery sent by the President of the United States or his Secretary of War, and with a test oath, what would he have done? Would he have done as the Democrats in that State did, peaceably keep away from the polls, have no disturbance on the day of election, or would he have rallied his followers to assert their rights? I ask the Senator again, whether, if at a general election the year before, he, a Senator of the Congress of the United States, had been compelled to do as I had to do, walk under crossed bayonets to the polls, had seen his neighbors and friends driven away from the polls, run into the swamps, compelled to lay out in the night in the snow; what would he have done? Would he have rallied his friends in vindication of their rights, or would he have done as the Democrats of the State of Delaware did, let oppression take its course, and rely upon a solemn appeal to the judgment of the country for the vindication of their rights?

Mr. POMEROY. I have had considerable experience under this Democratic rule of making qualifications for voting, and my experience has not been very much dissimilar to the experience of the Senator from Delaware. When the Democrats undertook to prescribe the qualifications for voting in Kansas, when it was a Territory, they provided, in the first place, that before a man could vote he should pay a dollar to the sheriff, and, in the second place, that he should take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the organic act of the Territory, including the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and after all that, that he should be deprived of the right of voting if he should write, publish, or circulate anything in the Territory declaring that slavery did not exist there, and did not have the right to exist there. They also provided that no man should be permitted to enter the jury-box who believed that slavery did not exist in the Territory, or who should write or publish or circulate anything declaring that it had no legal status in the Territory. And finally they provided that we should swear, not only to support the organic act and the Constitution of the United States, but the fugitive slave law of 1850. It has been, I confess, a little amusing to me to hear men in this Senate reiterate against the test oaths required by General Banks at New Orleans, when they were loud and long here in upholding the Kansas-Nebraska policy, and required of us, by law—not simply by the command of a general, but by statute—to take the most infamous and oppressive oaths, or else not to vote at all.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We had to swear to support all the laws of the Missouri Legislature, passed and to be passed.

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot tell, and do not know, what has been the experience of my friend from Delaware. I do not know what difficulties he had in approaching the ballot-box last fall. I only know that when the Democratic party ruled in the Territory of Kansas they surrounded the ballot-box with difficulties, and sometimes we could not get near enough to it to shoot a ballot into it with a revolver. [Laughter.] But I hope these experiences have gone by, and that to-day and now Congress and the country are ready to allow the loyal and patriotic men of every State to manage their own matters in regard to voting.

I do not think that rebels should vote. I do not know that they have any rights that white men are bound to respect. [Laughter.] I know the Senator from Michigan said that the State of Louisiana had at the presidential election of 1860 fifty thousand voters, and that now they were able to poll but eight thousand, leaving the inference that there were at least some forty thousand voters in the State who did not participate in the election. That Senator cannot have forgotten the fact that more than thirty thousand, perhaps forty thousand men from that State, have gone into the rebel army, a majority of whom were voters. If you deduct that thirty thousand out of fifty thousand, there are but twenty thousand left. Out of that twenty thousand, it must be supposed that there were at least four or five thousand who live in those portions of the State where no ballot-box could be opened, perhaps eight thousand, leaving it a very fair conclusion that if eight thousand loyal men voted for this constitution, it embraced a majority of the loyal men in the State. I contend that when the majority of the loyal men of any State meet and organize a State constitution they should be respected. I leave the disloyal entirely out of the question. This constitution is an expression of the will of the loyal men of Louisiana. They are united in it. They intend to stand by it. It is the nucleus around which they intend to rally. They intend to maintain that constitution and their government, and I think it is the duty of this Congress to come to their aid. It is the duty of the Government and the country to do it.

I do not know as much about Louisiana as I do of Arkansas, but I have made myself thoroughly familiar with the facts in regard to Arkansas, and I am only sorry that it is not before the Senate. There are two reasons in favor of Arkansas where there is only one for Louisiana.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think the honorable Senator from Kansas answered fairly the question I propounded to him. He speaks of disability incurred, or imposed, by reason of the legislation of the Territory or of the incipient State in which he lived. I will say to the honorable Senator, however, if any such impositions were practiced upon the people of the Territory of Kansas I would not at that time, and would not now, justify them; and although I was not then in public life, I will take this occasion to say that had I been I should have been in favor of the submission of the constitution of Kansas to the people of the Territory of Kansas.

But I called the attention of the honorable Senator to foreign interposition in reference to the right of citizens of a State to vote, and I asked him for his opinion. Had he lived in a State in which this foreign interposition had been practiced, what would he have done? Would he have done as the Democrats of the State of Delaware did—kept away from the polls, avoided excitement, avoided bloodshed; or would he have summoned his followers to stand up to their rights?

Mr. President, I am glad to observe this change that I think has come over the spirit of some of my Republican friends. I think they begin to scent the danger in the distance, that they begin to see that if a Government of law is to be destroyed, and power is to be concentrated in executive hands, or in the hands of executive agents, there is an end of liberty in this country. I hail the dawn, therefore, of a better day. I was delighted the other day to hear the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary avow his opposition to any other form of government but that of a government regulated by law, and to protest against what he considered infractions of the fundamental law of the land. I welcome, now, the honorable Senator from Kansas into the number of those who intend in future, judging from his remarks on this occasion, to resist by all the powers that they possess as legislators, any further continuance of this practice of interfering with the freedom of elections in the States.

It was for this purpose, and for this only, and not to continue this debate, that I rose and made the remarks that I did, and tried to obtain a direct answer from the honorable Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] when he was on the floor last alluded to the admission of Missouri, and left the impression, no doubt, that this was a similar case; in fact he said it was a case in point. The proposition of the Senator is to add the following:

That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Louisiana there shall be no denial of the electoral franchise, or of any other rights, on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law.

The Senator from Maryland cited him to the constitutional provision which leaves this question of suffrage entirely to the States:

"And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

The Senator, in reply to that, said that there was a compact made with the State of Missouri of the same character upon the entrance of that State into the Union.

Mr. SUMNER. I said a compact imposing a condition upon Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. A fundamental condition upon the admission of the State into the Union that was similar in character.

Mr. SUMNER. I think I said, a compact imposing a condition, precisely as I now propose to impose a condition upon Louisiana, and to that extent it was similar.

Mr. HENDERSON. The difference between the case and the one under consideration is this: the Senator and myself both agree that the State of Louisiana is now in the Union. The Senator said so last night. Then we agree upon that proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. It is in and it is not. [Laughter.] The territory is in; but as yet there is no State government that is in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot answer that proposition. When I insist that it is in he says it is; but when I attempt to show that it is not in the position of a Territory asking permission into the Union, then he says it is not in.

Mr. President, I have looked back to the record in the case of Missouri to see if my impression was correct. My impression was that the convention that adopted a constitution for the State of Missouri, in one of its provisions, in the belief of Congress, had run directly counter to a constitutional provision. The Senate will see that one provision of the constitution as adopted by the State of Missouri read in this way:

"It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary, first, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming into and settling in this State under any pretext whatever."

That was the shape in which the constitution stood when it was sent to Congress in 1820. Congress objected to the admission of the State because of that provision. It was not in consequence of the difficulty that originated in regard to the existence of slavery in the State, for that was settled by the act of March 6, 1820; but when the constitution of Missouri came here, and this subject came to be considered, Congress said that it contravened this provision of the Constitution of the United States:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Congress said that the provision in the State constitution of Missouri was in contravention of that provision of the Constitution of the United States. Then the law of 1821, referred to by the Senator, was passed, in these words:

"That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete."

The Legislature of Missouri, then being in session, took this question up and added this proviso to the provision that I have read:

"Provided, That nothing in this constitution shall be construed to conflict with the provisions of the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States."

After the adoption of this proviso added to this section, so as to show that the constitution of Missouri could be no longer considered as contravening this provision of the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Monroe issued his proclamation, and the State was admitted. I say it is not an analogous case. It is not analogous, in the first place, because Missouri was then a Territory, and Louisiana is now a State. In the second place, it is not an analogous case because the provision in the constitution of the State of Missouri was in direct contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and it required this explanation; and I say it was perfectly right that Congress should require of the State of Missouri an amendment to that provision. The State had no right to say that free negroes entitled to the rights of citizenship in other States should be excluded from that State. That is my belief. I do not say that upon removing into the State of Missouri they were entitled at once to all the rights that they enjoyed in other States, but the meaning of that provision of the Constitution of the United States is that no citizen of a State shall be treated as an alien in any other State. But in this case the proposition is not to reconcile a provision of the constitution of Louisiana with the Constitution of the United States; but if this provision of the Constitution in regard to suffrage leaves to the States the right to settle that question for themselves, then the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts contravenes the Constitution itself.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not propose now to go into the general debate; possibly before it closes I may say something; but what I have to say now is simply to correct errors. I see the Senator from Maryland reading a newspaper.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not unconstitutional, I hope. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says he hopes it is not unconstitutional. With his latitudinarianism in the construction of the Constitution, certainly it is not. But just before the recess, it will be remembered that the Senator, with more than his usual loudness of voice and earnestness, crossing over the avenue, I believe, as if for some kind of demonstration, undertook to correct me on at least two different matters of history. I shall take them up in their order.

The first was with regard to the opinions of George Washington on consolidation; and there he had also the backing of his friend, the Senator from Missouri. I had ventured to quote, in my simplicity, what I always understood to be the sentiment of Washington; and I had referred to his very authoritative words in that remarkable letter to the Congress of the United States, addressed by him, as President of the National Convention that framed the Constitution, concluding as follows:

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

Senators cannot have forgotten how the Senator from Maryland sought to argue that away. He insisted that Washington did not mean what he said; that he did not mean consolidation, though he used the word; and he charged me with proposing something absolutely unimagined, the actual bringing of all these States into one united republic. That, according to him, was not Washington's idea. His idea was simply the consolidation of the Union; though perhaps it will require all the legal acumen of the learned Senator to show any difference between the two ideas.

But, sir, Washington spoke on that subject more than once, and on one other occasion he spoke, if possible, with more distinctness than on the occasion to which I have already referred. I have now before me his letter to John Jay, written late in the summer of 1787, just before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in which he alludes to the crying evils of the Confederation in this very particular, namely, that there was in it no consolidation, and he says:

"We have errors to correct. We have probably had too good an opinion of human nature in forming our Confederation. Experience has taught us that men will not adopt and carry into execution measures the best calculated for their own good without the intervention of coercive power. I do not conceive we can exist long as a nation without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State governments extends over the several States."

There, sir, are the words of Washington. I will read the last sentence again:

"I do not conceive we can exist long as a nation without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State governments extends over the several States."

And he then proceeds:

"To be fearful of investing Congress, constituted as that body is, with ample authorities for national purposes, appears to me the very climax of popular absurdity and madness."

There, sir, you have Washington's idea of consolidation.

But the Senator from Maryland, not content with correcting me when I undertook to quote the opinions of Washington, also corrected me when I referred to the origin of the resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union. I stated that it came from Mr. Clay. The Senator from Maryland very promptly and earnestly said I was mistaken; it did not come from Mr. Clay; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] rose and said the same thing. Now, sir, I have before me a book which we all recognize in this Chamber as of authority—Hickey's edition of the Constitution, with historical illustrations. There, under the head of "Missouri," you will find this note:

"On February 26, Mr. Clay"—

I believe there was only one Mr. Clay at that time—

—from the joint committee, reported a 'resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, on a certain condition,' which resolution was passed and approved March 2, 1821. The said condition was accepted by the Legislature of Missouri by 'a solemn act declaring the assent of this State to the fundamental condition' contained in a resolution passed by the Congress of the United States, providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, on a certain condition, which was approved by the Governor on June 23, 1821."

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SUMNER. I shall be done in a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. Only a moment. It is very probable that Mr. Clay from the committee, as its chairman, reported the Missouri Compromise.

Mr. SUMNER. This is not the compromise.

Mr. DAVIS. I had referred to that.

Mr. SUMNER. I thought the Senator was in error at the time from confounding the two different stages of that remarkable session.

Mr. DAVIS. One was at one session, and the other at another.

Mr. SHERMAN. I happened to know Senator Thomas of Illinois in the later years of his life, and he always boasted that he was the author of the famous division line of 36° 30'; but that was passed the year before the resolution now alluded to by the honorable Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that was the occasion of the mistake, and I merely now, as some of our predecessors here have been in the habit of saying, make this correction for the truth of history; and this is my answer to the two criticisms which the Senator from Maryland at the close of his very earnest remarks chose to make. And that brings me to the resolution itself.

The Senator from Missouri has now introduced another element. He says that it is not a case in point on the present occasion. He will pardon me if I say I differ from him. It is a case precisely in point. As the lawyers say, the two cases run on all fours. There is a resolution now pending, reported by the Senator from Illinois, for the recognition of Louisiana as a State in this Union, precisely as on that other occasion there was a resolution pending, or indeed an act of Congress that had already passed, for the admission of Missouri as a State of this Union. Congress, at that day, on the motion of Henry Clay, felt authorized to impose upon Missouri a certain fundamental condition, without which Missouri should not take a place in the Union. All that I propose by the amendment which I have had the honor to send to the Chair is, that Congress now imitating the example of our fathers, when it is proposed to recognize (for that is the phrase employed) the State government of Louisiana, shall impose a certain fundamental condition upon the performance of which the recognition shall be consummated.

Mr. HENDERSON. With consent of the Senator I will remark that in that case, as I have stated, the constitution of Missouri conferred upon the Legislature of Missouri a power to contravene the Constitution of the United States, by legislation prohibiting free negroes having the right of citizenship in other States from coming into the State. Surely he does not pretend to say there is any provision in the constitution of the State of Louisiana directly contravening the Constitution of the United States. If so, I would like to hear it.

Mr. SUMNER. I will not now be drawn into that point of the discussion, whether there is in the Louisiana constitution anything contravening the Constitution of the United States or not, because it is immaterial. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I like to take things one by one, one question at a time, and the question now is as to the power of Congress at this moment, when it is asked to recognize a certain State government, to impose a condition precedent to such recognition.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, the question of suffrage under the Constitution is not left to the respective States.

Mr. SUMNER. In answer to that question, I say it has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator, I desire to state that if the question of suffrage be left to the respective States, the very compact that he wants to make with the State of Louisiana contravenes the Constitution of the United States. In the case of Missouri, it was to square the action of the State convention with the Constitution of the United States, because surely Congress at the time of the admission of a State has a right to say whether its constitution is republican or not; and in determining that question, Congress must determine it with a view to the Constitution of the United States. Then if, under the Constitution of the United States, the citizens of each State are to be entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in other States, and the convention of a State undertakes to confer upon the Legislature the power to say that that shall not be the case, Congress has the perfect right, before admitting the State, to make it republican. To make it how republican? To make it square with the Constitution of the United States. But, I say, if the Senator admits that the question of suffrage is left to the States, then his condition tears down the Constitution instead of building it up.

Mr. SUMNER. I yielded of course very gladly to the Senator from Missouri. I was simply observing, and I tried to bring home to the attention of the Senate, that at this moment it is proposed to recognize a certain government, and I have moved to recognize it on a certain condition. The Senator from Missouri thinks we cannot impose any such condition. I think we can. I had the honor at the close of the last session, in company I think with my friend from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] to vote for what is known as the reconstruction bill, which did undertake to impose conditions with reference to the electoral franchise upon what are called States. Did anybody at that time say that it was unconstitutional? Did even the Senator from Missouri rise then and protest against that bill as unconstitutional on that ground?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state that the proposition that I voted for was merely to exclude the electoral votes of those States.

Mr. SUMNER. I am speaking of the action of last summer.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know that very well. My colleague offered an amendment excluding the electoral votes of those States, and that was adopted in this body. There was no vote upon the original proposition for reconstruction as it came from the House, according to my recollection.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It passed on the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I did not vote for it.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. There was nothing in the reconstruction bill as to what the qualifications for voting should be definitely. There was a general expression that the rights of all men should be respected, or something of that kind. There was nothing in the reconstruction bill (which the President did not sign after it had passed both Houses) that prescribed definite qualifications for voting, such as to give the elective franchise to colored men, in so many words.

Mr. SUMNER. Now I must beg my honorable friend's pardon. The bill had two forms. In one form there was the word "white," and in one the word "white" was out, as the basis of the electoral franchise. The bill, as it finally passed, did have the word "white" as the basis of the electoral franchise, thus undertaking to determine the electoral franchise; but the bill which my friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] had in charge was without the word "white;" so that the electoral franchise, according to his bill, was open to both white and black; and I was not aware that at that time any person supposed that we were exercising an unconstitutional power when we undertook in passing a reconstruction bill to say that the electoral franchise should be exercised by all without distinction of color. Certainly that is a new idea to come from the very patriotic and humane and philanthropic mind of my friend from Kansas, that Congress, when reconstructing rebel States, cannot stamp upon them freedom in all respects, and remove absolutely all disabilities on account of color. I cannot doubt that, at this moment and under existing exigencies, Congress has rights and duties there hardly less than in the District of Columbia.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand that Congress is now reconstructing rebel States. The people of Louisiana themselves have undertaken to reconstruct and reorganize their government, and the question here is whether we will recognize what they have done. I dissent from the doctrine that Congress can reconstruct the rebel States. I do not believe in it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Massachusetts seems to suppose that he has corrected me most successfully. It is not the first time in which his inferences have not been justified by the fact.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought you objected to my speaking so loud that you heard too much.

I said that General Washington by his letter communicating the proceedings of the Convention by whom the Constitution of the United States was framed, did not mean to say that that Constitution was establishing a Government with plenary, absolute power. All that he meant in the use of the term "consolidation" was that the Union (for he spoke of it in connection with the Union) would be a stronger Union than the Union which existed under the Articles of Confederation.

The honorable member supposes that he finds his interpretation of that letter to be warranted by the other letter to which he has referred, written by Washington to Mr. Jay in 1787, before the Constitution was adopted. Now, what is that letter? It is nothing more than Mr. Madison said, and Mr. Hamilton said, and all the men who were engaged in framing it said. All that they meant was, that the Government, as it existed under the Articles of Confederation, was not strong enough; it had no power to act upon the individual citizen. All the powers with which it was endowed were powers to be exercised, so far as compulsion was concerned, by compulsory proceeding against the State. That was found to be mischievous, to be impracticable. They wanted to lay a tariff of duties; but its provisions could not be carried out without the consent of the States. Some States would consent and some would not consent. They wanted to lay taxes. Money was to be raised to carry on the Government. The State of Massachusetts was to pay so much, Rhode Island so much, and so throughout the other States. Some States paid and some would not pay. Mr. Jefferson supposed that even under the Articles of Confederation Congress had the authority by force of arms to compel the several States to pay the amount of the requisitions to meet the expenses of the Government; but it never was exercised. The great difficulty was that there did not exist in that form of Government a power to proceed against the individual citizen.

The honorable member will find, and has found, because his reading is full upon all these subjects—I am only finding fault with the effect of his prejudices upon his reason; it is not because he does not know, but because from some cause he does not correctly interpret—he will find that Mr. Madison and all the others said (and such is the fact) that there was very little difference between the powers conferred upon the General Government by the Articles of Confederation and those conferred upon the General Government by the Constitution, so far as the mere powers were concerned; that is to say, the subjects which the powers were intended to embrace. The difficulty was the want of an authority under the Confederation to make those powers efficient, and that difficulty consisted in the absence of any authority to proceed against the individual citizens. General Washington in his letter to Mr. Jay says that what he wants, and what is necessary, and unquestionably he was right in that, is that the Government itself should, for all national purposes, have the means to carry out its own powers. If the honorable member will consult the opinion of Marshall, in the case of McCulloch and the State of Maryland, and the opinion of Marshall in the case of Lewis, to which he referred the other day, he will find in those two cases, and in every case in which the question has arisen, that the Supreme Court of the United States, when Marshall stood at its head, recognized the existence of the State as sovereign over all subjects of power not intrusted to the Government of the United States; that in relation to subjects intrusted to the Government of the United States, that Government is just as sovereign as were the States before the Constitution was adopted in relation to all matters belonging to the State governments; and that in relation to all matters belonging to the State governments antecedently, not delegated by the Constitution to the Government of the United States, the States remain sovereign. The whole difficulty, therefore, is, not whether the States are not sovereign over some subjects, and the United States Government is not sovereign over other subjects, but whether either is exclusively sovereign over the whole; and I have never heard that question raised by anybody except by the honorable member.

Now, as to the other matter of fact in which he supposes he has corrected me, I did not contradict the honorable member, and I am little surprised, as I speak so loud, that he was not aware that I did not contradict him. I did not say to the honorable member that Mr. Clay was not the author of that condition. I do not know that he was, except so far as I collect it from the fact that he reported it from the committee, but I did not know that he was not; and I therefore did not contradict the honorable member. The contradiction came from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL.] Mr. Clay has heretofore, up to a comparatively recent period, been supposed to be the author of what is called the "Missouri Compromise," by which it was provided that slavery should not exist on one side of a certain line, and nothing being said in relation to slavery upon the other side, it was supposed that, impliedly, it was authorized south of the Missouri line; but he was not the author of that. The author of that, I think, was Mr. Thomas, of Illinois.

The honorable member seems to suppose that he finds in that precedent an authority for what he proposes to do in this case. There never was, I think, (and I speak it with all the respect I feel for the honorable member's opinion,) a greater misapprehension. Does the honorable member mean to say that a State may be brought into the Union upon any condition from which, when it is in, it will not be at liberty to escape? He does not mean that. What is the right of a State under the Constitution? I endeavored to show this morning, and I shall not repeat it, that it is the right of a State under the Constitution to regulate

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 70.

the right of suffrage. I cannot make it any plainer than to refer, as I did this morning, to the two provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution provides, so far as representation in Congress is concerned, that the party elected shall be of a certain age—that is all; but as to the qualifications of the elector who is to elect him in the State, it leaves that to the State by providing that those qualifications are to be the same as those that are required by the constitution of the State to elect members to the most numerous branch of their State Legislature. If I am right as to that, the amendment of the honorable member says that the State, if admitted, is to be admitted upon the express condition, or rather that the admission is not to take effect, to use the very words of his amendment—

Except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the electoral franchise, or of any other rights, on account of color or race; but all persons shall be equal before the law.

It is bad enough with regard to the right of suffrage; but there are other rights beside the right of suffrage. Does the honorable member mean to say that the State cannot by law provide that no black man shall be married to a white woman; or that no black woman shall be married to a white man, and that it will be penal upon the part of the magistrate, or the clergyman, when a clergyman is used, to administer the rite of marriage in that way? Does he mean to say that it shall not be in the power of the State to provide that no black man shall be a witness, or how he shall be a witness? Does he mean to say that a State may not provide that a white man where he is a party to a controversy may be a witness in his own case, and that they cannot say that a black man may not be a witness in his own case? Does he mean to say that they cannot provide anything into which a white man may enter which a black man shall not be at liberty to enter? Does he mean to say that they may not extend the right of going to the courts to the white, and not extend it to the black, or to the black and not extend it to the white? If he means that, he takes from the State all the authority that everybody, from the time the Constitution was adopted to the present hour, has supposed to be the especial right of the State.

But that is not all. The Constitution provides not only that the right of suffrage shall be decided by the State, but it provides that each State shall have two Senators. Does the honorable member suppose that by attaching a fundamental condition to this law, he can take from Louisiana the right to send any Senators, or only one Senator? The Constitution gives to the State the right to send the same number of Representatives, in proportion to population, that the other States send. Does he mean to say that Congress can, by fixing a fundamental condition to the law receiving Louisiana into the Union, deprive her of the right of sending a like number of Representatives with every other State according to her population? If so, we should have a State that is no State; and instead of being a Union of equals, it would be a Union of unequals. Instead of sitting here as the representatives of States entitled precisely to the same rank in the galaxy of States—I am afraid I am speaking too loud for the very tender ears of the honorable member from Massachusetts—we should be here, some of us, particularly he who came from Louisiana, bound to bow in implicit deference to the majesty of Massachusetts. She can regulate the right of suffrage. She can deny it to any man who does not read or write, black or white—

Mr. SUMNER. Without distinction of color.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the difference is only that distinction of color. We have had before us, and I do not know whether it has passed or not, but I suggest it to the honorable member because this subject always seems to be in his mind—we have before us a bill to incorporate a hotel company in this city. I hope he will put in it a provision that the guests are not to be excluded on account of color.

Mr. SUMNER. Will you vote for it?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; but you ought to offer it, and if it was voted for, and voted in, I doubt whether the honorable member would be one of the guests. Certainly he would not, if he is so fortunate as to bring Mrs. Sumner with him one of these days. [Laughter.] According to my view it is monstrous.

But, sir, if the Constitution gives to Congress the power, in order to preserve the Government, of attaching such a condition to the admission of Louisiana, why not say that Ohio shall not regulate in the future the right of suffrage? These persons are not permitted to vote in Ohio. I believe they get around the provision partially, the provision being that none but white persons shall exercise the right of suffrage, by saying that when they have a certain portion of white blood in them, though black they may be, they are to be considered as white.

Mr. WADE. If they are more white than black, they are considered white.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is your law; but if they happen to be more black than white, then they are black, and they are not permitted to vote. Why, it is a horrid provision! I wonder how the State has got on! I do not believe they have got any liberty there. I think they are all a set of serfs; or what is still worse, if anything can be worse, they are a set of tyrants. How does my friend from Ohio reconcile it to his conscience to live in a State which strikes at the very foundation of the Government, according to the idea of the Senator from Massachusetts? And yet he seems to be very easy in his conscience. The State certainly has prospered very much, and nobody has questioned the validity of that provision; and that is to be found in nearly all the States.

Now, Mr. President, if Congress has a right to affix this as a condition (provided I am right in supposing that the States alone can provide for the exercise of the right of franchise) there is nothing which a State has, no power which a State has which may not be taken from her by doing it in the form of a fundamental condition.

The honorable member is entirely mistaken in supposing, if he does suppose it, that I have any hostility to the black race. I have not the slightest hostility to them. I do not think they ought to vote, at any rate now. I mean those who are to be brought in by sudden emancipation. What will be the effect? Has the honorable member ever thought of the effect upon his own State and other States?

Mr. SUMNER. They vote in Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that; but I am speaking of what you propose to do now by congressional action, to provide that all the blacks shall be admitted to the right of suffrage. Has he thought for a moment what will be the effect on his own State and similar States? How many Representatives does Massachusetts send, founded upon her voting population? There are very few blacks there. It is almost entirely a white population. How many does Louisiana send? Less by a great deal than she would be entitled to if these provisions are made. Let all her negroes in, and you increase the number of her Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. Representation is founded on population.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course. What sort of a population? Do you not mean to do away with the three-fifths clause? Certainly you will let all in. If the South comes in to-morrow there are four million negroes whom you will permit to vote; and they will be entitled to vote for a representation to be graduated by that number. Do you not see how largely the representation of the South will be increased in the other Chamber?

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is graduated now by population absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, it is not; but three fifths of a certain class of population is included in the enumeration.

Mr. SUMNER. But three fifths, assuming that there are slaves; but when slaves cease to exist, and slaves have ceased now unless in the imagination of some Senators—

Mr. JOHNSON. No, I have not said that slavery has ceased unless you adopt the amendment. I do not think it has ceased, nor will it cease until the amendment has been ratified.

Mr. SUMNER. As soon as nineteen States ratify it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is according to your view.

Mr. SUMNER. According to the constitutional view.

Mr. JOHNSON. If your view is always the constitutional view that is the constitutional view; but I suppose that may admit of some difference of opinion. But I am not speaking merely of the number of Representatives and the increase the South is going to have, but how do you suppose they will be influenced? The honorable member is greatly mistaken if he supposes that the whole of that vote will not for years be in the hands of a few white men. You will have what I have heard often described here as the car-whip of the South. I do not think they will try that again, but we may have it.

In a word, Mr. President, so far as the particular proposition before the Senate is concerned, I say to the honorable member from Massachusetts, and all those who wish that slavery should be so abolished as to be placed beyond the reach of doubt, let these States in, then get a ratification of the constitutional amendment by such a number of States as will place it beyond all question that it is a part of the organic law. My reading of the Constitution is, that there must be three fourths of the States; whether they have Legislatures or not in existence makes no difference. If they have not Legislatures you cannot get it confirmed. If they have them, they will affirm or reject it. Let in Louisiana, let in Arkansas, and let in either of the other seceded States who adopt a free constitution as this constitution has been adopted, and then the ratification of the amendment is certain, and this terrible source of evil—how it has become a source of evil I do not stop to inquire, I look only to the fact—this existing cause of evil, will be removed now and forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, to insert the words "or sex."

Mr. CARLILE addressed the Senate. His remarks are withheld for revision.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, it has got now to be pretty late in the evening. This question is considered by all as being an exceedingly important one; and I move that the resolution be postponed until the first Monday in December next; on which motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. VAN WINKLE] is detained from the Senate this evening by sickness; at least he is so indisposed as that he thought he ought not to be here, and I have agreed to pair off with him on all material votes on this question, he being in favor of the resolution as reported by the committee and I being opposed to it, but we both being opposed, as I understand him, to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

Mr. POWELL. Before the motion to postpone is put I wish to make a few minutes' reply to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] The Senator from Missouri in his argument seemed to think it exceedingly strange that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and I should have agreed on this matter. He spoke of extremes meeting and all that kind of thing. I think it is a little strange that the Senator from Massachusetts and I should agree upon a grave question like this. The truth is that I can hardly tell why the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] who are the peculiar advocates of this measure here, have parted company with the Senator from Massachusetts on this occasion. The Senator from Missouri I have regarded as grazing in the abolition field for the last two years, and it is a little singular that these abolition brethren should part company. I am more astonished at the Senator from Missouri than I have been at the Senator from Massachusetts, because the Senator from Missouri has still some old Democratic instincts of State rights; he is very sound in theory on that point, but in this particular case I think very unsound in practice. In a measure of this kind, that I consider so destructive to the Constitution of my country, I am delighted that the Senator from Massachusetts should give me his aid and that we should vote together. I know that the Senator from Massachusetts—at least in my esteem—is seldom right on issues of this kind, but because that Senator so far exhibits a lucid interval as to come to a correct conclusion, notwithstanding I reject all his premises, I see no reason why I should not go against the resolution even in company with the Senator from Massachusetts. I here congratulate the country that the Senator from Massachusetts has come to a correct conclusion on this great and important question. I and others might not come to the same conclusion starting from the premises he does. I do not concur in the premises the Senator from Massachusetts has indicated here. I am opposed to negro suffrage; I am opposed to this equality of negroes with white men, and I am opposed to all the kindred heresies of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I can say to the Senator from Missouri that I am equally opposed to his disunion negroisms. That Senator announced in this Chamber last night, the first time that I have heard it, that he would prefer dissolution to union with slave States.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, Mr. President, I made no such announcement.

Mr. POWELL. I so understood.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is mistaken. I stated that this controversy upon the slavery question had gone to such an extent that slave States and free States could not live together, and that I believed that the inconveniences to-day to arise from a dissolution of the Union would be less than to undertake to cover up the slavery question and to reunite the country, and smother it, the slavery issue, for only a short time, to break out again with renewed violence.

Mr. POWELL. I understood the Senator to declare that he preferred disunion to a union of slave States and free States.

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated what I believed would come of an attempted recognition of slave and free States, and I stated further that it would be better in my opinion to make a division than to undertake to patch up a reunion in that way, because it would be attended with another war, and it was only in consequence of that fact that I made the assertion.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator's explanation is not different from my understanding of his language. Now, I am opposed to that sentiment of the Senator from Missouri. I am for the old Union, under the old Constitution, and under the old flag. I am willing to take it as it was given to us by Washington and Madison, with the States as they are, if they choose to come back. I desire each State in this Union to form its own domestic institutions in its own way, subject alone to the Constitution of the United States, and I should rejoice to-day if every one of the States in arms against the Government would lay down their arms, come back, and acknowledge their allegiance to the Government of the United States. I think the Senator from Massachusetts entertains the same view on that subject that the Senator from Missouri has uttered, but he has heretofore not uttered it.

But, sir, it seems to me that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Wisconsin desire the passage of this resolution to admit Senators and Representatives from Louisiana and to recognize that State government adopted there, for the purpose, and almost for the sole purpose, of allowing that State to vote on the constitutional amendment, for they press that argument on all occasions, and that seems to be the thought uppermost in their minds. I believe the Senator from Missouri claims the paternity of the constitutional amendment. It is a kind of bantling with him. It seems to be his first-born since he joined the abolition phalanx, and I do not wonder that he should feel some little interest in this child of his. It is, however, strange to me that the Senator from Missouri, while indicating as he did that he agreed with me as to the usurpations of the military, should come to the conclusion to vote for this resolution. I did not discuss the question on any outside or collateral point. I based my opposition solely on the ground that the loyal men in the State of Louisiana did not have the opportunity to form this government of their own free will, unawed and uninfluenced by military power, but that it was a government made by military force at the point of the bayonet, and that those who voted for this resolution would vote to recognize the doctrine contained in the President's amnesty proclamation, would vote to recognize the doctrine that a United States major general had a right to trample upon State constitutions and prescribe the qualifications of voters. All those who vote for it will have to acknowledge these premises. I for one cannot and will not do it.

The Senator from Missouri asks what loyal men were prevented from voting by General Banks's orders. I will say to the Senator that all the loyal Union men in the State of Louisiana who refused, like supple menials and slaves, to crouch beneath the iron military power of General Banks, and take that oath, were excluded from voting, and I believe to-day there are more men of that description in Louisiana than voted to ratify this constitution. That oath required that those who took it should swear that they would not only support and abide by all the proclamations of the President in regard to the institution of slavery already issued, but those thereafter to be issued; and I do hold, as I asserted last night, that no true man, no man who had the honest instincts of a manly nature, would so degrade himself as to take that humiliating oath at the dictation of any usurper or any tyrant on the face of the earth; and I believe there were many more loyal true Union men in Louisiana who declined to take that oath than voted to ratify the Banks' constitution. That is the fact, I am sure, if it can ever be ascertained distinctly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Have you heard of any objection to it on the part of the loyal men of Louisiana?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir, I have. Thomas J. Durant and thirty-one others, distinguished, leading, loyal men of Louisiana, as I asserted last night, have made earnest and powerful protest against this organization, and protested against Congress admitting Representatives either into the other House or this. They protest against the vote of Louisiana being counted. Mr. Durant, I believe, was the first district attorney appointed by the present Executive in Louisiana.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask if Mr. Durant was not a candidate for office at that election, and whether he himself did not take the oath prescribed, whether he did not participate in the election.

Mr. POWELL. I do not know whether Mr. Durant was a candidate for office or not, neither do I know whether he took the oath. But allow me to ask my friend from Missouri would he, under the circumstances, have bowed before Nathaniel P. Banks and taken that oath? I do not believe the Senator, under such circumstances, would have taken it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was not in Louisiana.

Mr. POWELL. Whether you were there or not, I do not believe you would take it anywhere on the face of the earth, for I have great regard for the Senator from Missouri. I believe he is a man. I believe he possesses all the high and noble attributes that form a man. I do not believe the honorable Senator from Missouri would, for all the offices in the gift of all the men on the face of the earth, at the dictation of a major general, take that humiliating and degrading oath. Neither do I believe my friend from Maryland would have taken it. He, full of years as he is of honors, would have scorned to have so degraded his manhood as to come up and acknowledge himself to be the supple menial of this major general. I believe that every good and loyal man will take every oath prescribed by the Constitution and laws of his country; but I believe he will take no oath at the dictation of usurpers and tyrants. That there are thousands of men in Louisiana who are noble specimens of manhood, I do not doubt; and that class of Union men, if they refused to take this humiliating oath under the order of General Banks, could not vote. If a Union man there adored the old Union and the old flag, and fought in the ranks of the Union Army from the firing of the first gun at Fort Sumter up to the day the election was held, he could not have voted unless he took this oath; and yet we are told that is a government of the people. Not so, Mr. President. It is a government not of the people of Louisiana, formed by their own volition, but it is a government coerced upon them by the military authority of this Government, and I never will agree by any vote of mine to overthrow every principle of civil, republican, and constitutional liberty by recognizing a government formed in such a way. Let the people of Louisiana, of their own volition, meet and form a State government; let all the loyal men of Louisiana cooperate in the formation of that government; do not interdict a large portion of them who fail to take unconstitutional and unlawful oaths. Let them come here and present their government, formed unawed and uninfluenced by the military power, and I will rejoice to welcome them. But a government formed in any other way is destructive of the very principles of liberty.

My friend from Missouri says there is no Union when you abolish State rights. In that I agree. The rights of the States must be preserved and protected, and he says if you depart from this doctrine of State rights you have a consolidated despotism. In that I concur, but how the honorable Senator can from that premise support this government of Louisiana in violation and destruction of every principle of State rights he himself maintains, I am at a loss to know. What power, I ask again, has a major general to go into Louisiana or any State and dictate to the people who shall vote; to take upon himself to amend their constitution in more particulars than one? He amended it when he prescribed the qualification of voters; he amended it when he said that slavery should not exist there.

The Senator from Wisconsin declares that admitting this free State of Louisiana will knock the shackles off from ninety thousand slaves. General Banks, in the statement he made before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, declares that there were no people in Louisiana to which that provision of the constitution will apply. Who is right or wrong? I am rather inclined to believe that Banks was wrong, because in that whole statement General Banks was acting evidently the part of a swift witness, to make a case that he thought would cause Louisiana to be admitted.

By giving a vote to recognize the government as formed under this Banks administration as the legitimate government of Louisiana, you acknowledge despotism in its worst and vilest form; you then have consolidation that I had supposed would revolt even the stomach of the Senator from Missouri; you admit the principle that a major general of the Army could do all the things I have indicated.

Mr. President, I cannot see how the Senators who a few days ago voted for the resolution declaring that the electoral vote of Louisiana should not be counted can consistently vote for this resolution. I hope that some Senator on the other side will explain that point; so far they have not attempted it. This constitution was formed in Louisiana; it was proclaimed, it was ratified by the six thousand and some odd votes. The Legislature made under and by virtue of it elected the Senators here who demand admission, and this resolution is but a forerunner of the admission of members here and Representatives in the other end of this Capitol. Senators voted the other day that the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana should not be counted. If Louisiana was then a legitimate government, why was she not entitled to cast her electoral vote? I believed then, as I now believe, that this is not a legitimate government of the loyal people of the State of Louisiana, but a government forced upon them at the point of the bayonet; and hence it was, believing that, that I cast my vote for the resolution forbidding the counting of the electoral vote of Louisiana. But many of those very gentlemen who voted with me for that resolution come up here now and strongly and persistently urge the adoption of this resolution, among them my friends from Maryland and Missouri. Why, sir, the very same governmental authority that appointed the Senators who demand admission here appointed the electors to cast the votes of Louisiana; they emanated from the very same authority. You tell me that a State has a legitimate government when you vote that its electoral vote shall not be counted, and then rise up here and say that the government is legitimate and their Senators shall be admitted! I cannot reconcile that inconsistency.

This resolution does not adopt or ratify the constitution of Louisiana at all. This Congress has no power to do such a thing, and I suppose no Senator has contended or will contend for that proposition. This resolution merely recognizes the government then formed as a legitimate government. The passage of this resolution does not make it legitimate. You merely state the fact that it is the legitimate government of the loyal people of Louisiana. If it is, they had a right to be represented in the Electoral College and to cast their votes, and those Senators who voted against counting the electoral vote of Louisiana cannot in my judgment vote for this resolution without inconsistency.

Mr. President, it was not my purpose to enter further into this debate, but for the fact that my friend from Missouri seemed to think it exceedingly strange that I should stray off with the Senator from Massachusetts, and he tried to make some capital on that ground; and hence I thought I would say a few words. I think the Senator from Missouri, after the sentiment he expressed in reference to Union with slaveholders, is rather ahead of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has believed it all the time, but he is too discreet to utter it just yet. The Senator from Missouri having taken the lead on that point, I have no doubt will soon catch up with the Senator from Massachusetts on the suffrage question. The Senator's colleague, the other distinguished Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] is now out openly for negro suffrage, and I do not believe from the rapid progress made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] that he will be long behind. For myself I have never been and never expect to be for negro suffrage or negro equality, or any of those kindred heresies, and I will never give a vote which will indicate that I believe that any other power than the sovereign people of a State of this Union has the right to make a State constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have paired off with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] on the passage of the joint resolution, and therefore do not feel at liberty to vote on this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agreed with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to pair off on the passage of the resolution. I do not know whether that will be considered as including this motion or not.

Several SENATORS. Of course it does.

Mr. JOHNSON. If there is any doubt about it, I decline to vote. I should vote in the negative if I was at liberty to do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 12, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Hendricks, Howard, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Willey—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Johnson, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question returns on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Howard, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—19.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. It is quite obvious that we can hardly get to a final vote this evening.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not?

Mr. HOWARD. I will tell the Senator why not if he will be a little patient.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not quite obvious, though.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it is now a quarter past ten o'clock on Saturday night. There is a bare quorum of the Senate present, and simply a quorum. This is the most important measure that has been before this Senate for years, in my opinion; one which will agitate the country more than any measure we have had before us. Is it not fair at least that the lean majority which is now present in this Chamber should permit the question to go over until Monday, until the absentees may be called in, and have an opportunity to record their votes upon the question? I move that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Howard, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Willey—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—20.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator from Michigan in the impropriety of pressing a measure of this importance. Perhaps it is the most important measure, as he says, that we have had before us. I shall regard its passage as a national calamity. It will be the political Bull Run of this Administration, sacrificing, as it will, a great cause, and the great destinies of this Republic. But, sir, I will not go into the debate at this time. I think the Senate is not now in a condition to vote finally upon it. There are many who would unquestionably like to record their votes upon it who are not now here. We ought to give them an opportunity. We ought also to give an opportunity for further discussion. It never has been the habit of the Senate, except in those days which we ought not to imitate—

Mr. FOSTER. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the honorable Senator if he is not fully prepared to vote on the questions?

Mr. SUMNER. I certainly am prepared to vote on it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will merely say I am.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the honorable Senator is not prepared to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the honorable Senator is.

Mr. SUMNER. I know I am prepared to vote upon it; but when the Senator from Connecticut speaks as he does, after voting as he has, I cannot but think that a little more study of the question, and a little more examination of its consequences, would enable him to vote with more intelligence. I think, on his account, it would be well that the question should be postponed for another day, to give him an opportunity of a little more reflection on this important matter. It is never too late to mend; and I think it not impossible that even that Senator, coming as he does from New England, representing, as I doubt not he does, liberal ideas, devoted as he ought to be to the cause of human freedom and of his country, may think there is something in this question which will justify the most mature consideration; something on which the Senate ought not to rush precipitously to a vote. Sir, this question ought not to be closed to-night, and I therefore move an adjournment: and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise for a personal explanation. I am paired off with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH.] I do not know how he would vote on these motions; but the pair was to last until this evening, and therefore I have declined to vote upon any of these side questions.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Howard, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Willey—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—21.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest now by the course being pursued by the Senator from Massachusetts, who takes upon himself to lecture other Senators, telling them they do not know how to vote, that he is in a combination here of a fraction of the Senate to delay the important business of the country. We find him now, near the closing days of the session, uniting with a very few persons acting with him, associating himself with those whom he so often denounces, for the purpose of calling the yeas and nays and making dilatory motions to postpone the action of this body upon what he says is a very great public measure, when he knows that next week other public measures are to be pressed upon the attention of the Senate; when he knows—

Mr. WADE. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. WADE. I wish to ask what is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADE. That is all I wanted to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Massachusetts gets up here and says absent members wish to vote, when he knows they were advertised here to-day that this matter was to be pressed to-night; when he knows that in full Senate they were told the intention was to press this bill, if possible, to-night; and yet we find the Senator from Massachusetts here declaring to the Senate that no vote shall be taken. Does he hold in his hand the Senate of the United States, that, in his omnipotence, he is to say when votes shall be taken and public measures shall be passed? Has it come to this? Is he charged with the administration of the Government, as he is at the head of one of the leading committees of the Senate, undertaking to carry on and maintain this great Government in this time of war; is he setting the example here of delaying public business by dilatory motions, refusing either to discuss the measure or allow it to be voted upon? And then he appeals to the Senate that they shall put this measure over for somebody else to get ready. If Senators are absent they are absent on their own responsibility. They knew this measure was up. The Senator from Massachusetts has fought it day after day to prevent it coming up; and when a large majority of the Senate has overruled him time and again, and decided that it should come up, he stands here at half after ten o'clock on Saturday night making dilatory motions to prevent the action of the body upon what he denominates "this great, important measure." Sir, there can be no excuse for such action.

I have refrained from taking up any time on this joint resolution. I did intend to say something upon it, and I would have done so to-night if the discussion had been continued, and there was a probability of coming to a vote. I have no disposition to press unreasonably a vote on this question. It is a matter that has been before the Senate of the United States for a number of weeks. It was discussed to some extent before it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was reported to this body a week ago. It has been deposited for several days. I should have been glad, if it must go over until next week, that it could have gone over without these manifestations of a determination to browbeat the Senate on the part of a minority. I shall be very glad if we can come to a vote to-night. If there was any reason given for postponing it until Monday, and we could come to a vote then, I should not attempt, for one, to force the Senate unreasonably. I desired to have a vote to-night; I desire to finish the resolution now to-night; but, sir, above all things I desire not to see such a course resorted to as is being attempted here to put off this great public measure.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois draws upon his imagination, which, on this occasion is peculiarly lively. I know not that anybody has undertaken to browbeat unless it be himself. Certainly nobody on the side with which I am associated has done any such thing, or I believe imagined doing such a thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I heard it said that there should be no vote to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. Well, sir, is that browbeating?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is undertaking to decide for the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that browbeating? No, sir; it is only undertaking to decide the conduct of an individual Senator with regard to an important public measure. The question between the Senator from Illinois and myself is simply this: he wishes to pass the measure, and I do not wish to pass it. He thinks the measure innocent; I think it dangerous; and thinking it dangerous, I am justified in opposing it, and justified, too, in employing all the instruments that I can find in the arsenal of parliamentary warfare. But, sir, I mean to employ them properly and in a parliamentary way. In no other way can I act in this Chamber.

The Senator from Illinois is entirely mistaken if he supposes that this measure can be passed to-night. I tell him it cannot. Parliamentary law is against him; and the importance of the measure justifies a resort to every instrument that parliamentary law supplies. The Senator knows it well. I need not even suggest it.

And now, sir, I have to counsel the Senator—perhaps he would say that I am taking too great a liberty, and even dictating—but I would counsel the Senator, first, to look at the clock. He will see that it is twenty-five minutes of eleven; that it is approaching Sunday morning. Then let him think that we have been here all day; and then I would counsel him to ask himself whether, all things considered, it is advisable to press this revolutionary measure after this protracted session, and at this late hour. I think his better judgment will come to the conclusion that it is not. At any rate, should he not come to that conclusion, I think he will make a mistake, and that all his efforts will be fruitless. There is a certain character of antiquity who was found sowing salt in the sand by the sea-shore, and plowing it in; and the Senator will be engaged in an occupation just about as profitable.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is now late in the evening, as has been remarked by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is my opinion that he has caused it to be late in the evening for us. He challenges the hour. He has done much to make the hour. If volubility and wisdom are one, he is the wisest man in the world. [Laughter.] It is the desire of the Senate, who are desirous to vote on this subject, to get to a conclusion. I came here for that purpose. I desire to vote. My opinions have been matured, and I think the opinions of every Senator here on this floor have been matured on this present subject, and this prolonged conversation, or discourse, or elocution, or whatever you may call it, is not valuable to the business of our Government or the conduct of the Senate. I hope that we may have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate is very thin, and I move a call of the Senate; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOSTER. No such motion can be entertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that a motion of that kind has never been entertained by the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Powell, Riddle, Wilson, and Wright—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Hendricks, Hendricks, Howry, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wiley—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Howard, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilkinson—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to submit a very few remarks to the Senate upon this question, and if we are to come to a vote to-night I will do so now. I am opposed to this resolution, but have voted on every occasion to come to a vote. I have voted against adjournments and all delays. I was opposed to bringing this resolution up to the exclusion of other business; but now that it is before us I think we ought to dispose of it. If it is a pleasure to the Senate to take a vote to-night I appeal to the gentlemen who are opposed to the measure to satisfy their responsibility by giving a vote against it, leaving to the Senators who are not present the responsibility for their absence. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes in what I have got to say upon it; but if further motions to adjourn are made of course I do not care about speaking.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until next Saturday at twelve o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. It is this: that the Senator from Michigan is not present. [Laughter.] His name was called a few moments since, and the vote showed that he was not present, and he has not since come into the Chamber. I object, therefore, that he is not in the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have got back.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator has not left the Chamber. He refused to answer to his name, when, by the rules of the Senate, if a Senator is present he is required to vote, and that, of course, shows that he has seceded, and is, therefore, out of the body. [Laughter.] Having seceded from the body, and not yet returned to it, he ought not, as I submit to the Chair, to be recognized to make a motion. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. CHANDLER. At twelve o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. WADE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that his motion cannot be made in the form in which he submits it. A special order cannot be made for the next Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will leave off the special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I, like the Senator from Indiana, wish to submit some remarks to the Senate upon this subject, although I do not wish to trouble the Senate with such crude remarks as I can make except to explain my own position with reference to it. I am left to-night in this situation: a member of this body, differing with me in opinion in reference to this measure, he being in favor of it and I being opposed to it, asked me to pair off with him. I considered it a pair upon the final passage of the resolution; but as delay may defeat the measure, I have felt a sense of delicacy constraining me not to vote upon motions of adjournment or anything else. I feel the embarrassment of the charge that an attempt is being made to be factious and of leaving the Senate without a quorum, which under no circumstances I could do; which I have declined to do heretofore. But, sir, I wish an opportunity to say a few words upon this subject, and as the pair will last for to-night and will terminate with to-night, if the subject can be postponed I will join with my friend from Indiana in offering no opposition to a vote being taken at any reasonable hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No Senator, of course, is desirous of remaining here unnecessarily and accomplishing nothing. We may as well come to some practical conclusion; and for that purpose I move that this resolution be postponed until Monday evening at eight o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. WADE. There is a motion pending which is undecided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion already before the Senate to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until Saturday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose the Senator from Michigan merely interposed that motion so as to prevent a vote to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the call will proceed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Upon that question I have one word to say. The remark has been made that the Senator from Massachusetts, whose champion certainly I am not, and with whom I very seldom, perhaps never, act, is uniting himself with a portion of the members of this Senate with whom he does not usually act, to delay the action of the body, and to defeat definite action on this measure. It is true I find myself in the position to-night of cooperation with the Senator from Massachusetts, perhaps for the first time in my life; but believing the position he has taken, and those Senators who act with him, is the true position, I will have the manhood, in the face of the Senate of the United States, to declare that I am ready to cooperate with them in opposition to this measure. Though it may be charged, as it has been privately, that the extremes are acting together, and that the radicals are acting together, I avow that upon all such questions I am a radical. I will not give any vote nor do any act that shall countenance for one moment the power of the Executive of the United States, or of any military subaltern, to force a government upon the people of this country. I have seen enough in the history of my own little State of military power and the attempt to override organized law and fundamental constitutions, to withhold my approbation on this, and on every occasion, from the act of any Administration or any military power that shall attempt it.

Sir, I meet the accusation of acting with the radicals on the other side, if such there be, in the spirit of defiant manhood. When my judgment approves the course of radicals, I would rather be with radicals than with conservatives whose opinions I do not approve. I admire the men who nobly stand by their principles and carry them out to their ultimate conclusions. I disapprove of the principles with which the radicals of the Republican party started out four years ago in this contest; but when they nobly and manfully stand up to them, I am not the man to rise in the Senate of the United States and either by word or vote to condemn their action. I am a radical myself, a radical Democrat, believing that in the spirit of Democracy our institutions and our Government were founded, and believing that if ever you preserve that Government and those institutions you have got to come back and listen to the teachings of the Democratic founders of the country. It is not for me, who profess to be honest in my own convictions, to say that other gentlemen, however widely they may differ from me, are not honest in theirs.

I wish to say to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that I accept it as no imputation upon my consistency as a Democrat, that upon questions of this kind I am found cooperating with men so radically opposed to me as the members with whom I am now acting are opposed; and if this discussion is to be continued I wish now to advertise the Senate that military government, and government established by military power cannot be recognized in the Senate of the United States in one night of this session; and if forced to the mental encounter, I will enter into it and discuss somewhat the fundamental principles which lie at the very foundation of this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I was going to make a suggestion, and I will now make it to the Senate. I do not know whether it will meet with any favor or not. I have no disposition to keep the Senate here, or to force a vote unreasonably, if I have the power to do so, which I have not. A majority of the Senate control. But if we could go on with this resolution on Monday, take it up at one o'clock, and proceed with it without dilatory motions to adjourn and postpone, and, of course, let everybody discuss it who desires to do so—we cannot prevent that in the Senate until we come to a vote—if the Senate will agree to that, or could have an understanding that that should be the course pursued, I would not resist the adjournment. I think the Senator from Massachusetts ought to be satisfied, at any rate, with that course. If it can be understood that we will go on with this resolution on Monday, and continue with it until we finish it, of course allowing everybody to speak as long as he pleases, and that dilatory motions shall not be interposed, I will not object further to an adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois—

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that I have lost the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor, unless he yields to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can say to-night, although without preparation, what I propose to say on this subject as well, perhaps, as I can say it after a week's preparation; and if it be the pleasure of the Senate to sit here until Sunday morning, I am perfectly willing to go on.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better adjourn.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me appeal to the Senator from Delaware to withdraw that motion, because, of course, if we are going to adjourn with an understanding that this sort of thing is to be continued, we gain nothing. Cannot we come to an understanding that we shall continue and dispose of this resolution on Monday, before we adjourn now?

Mr. RIDDLE. I will withdraw the motion to enable the Senator to make that proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have made that proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. Let us adjourn, and that will leave this resolution as the unfinished business.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Illinois made, in a certain sense, an appeal to me. When he made it I said to myself, "There was a Senator from Illinois once in this Chamber. His name was Douglas. He, too, brought forward a proposition calculated to bring discord upon the country." You know it as the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I had the honor of a seat here at the time. He brought that proposition in precisely as my friend from Illinois now brings this in, proudly, confidently, almost menacingly, saying that he was to pass it—was it not in twenty-four hours?

Mr. WADE. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. Right off, precisely as the Senator from Illinois now speaks. The Senator from Illinois tears a leaf out of that hateful book; and now with another question, kindred in character to that which was once introduced by the other Senator from Illinois, he undertakes to press it upon the Senate. He takes a copy from that English officer who, in the time of the stamp act, said he would cram the stamps down the throats of the American people with the hilt of his sword, if need be. He is going to cram his resolution down the throats of the Senate, and he appeals to us to enter into some compact or understanding that we will allow the operation to proceed without the least resistance; that we will quietly consent to the cramming process. To be sure there is no hilt of a sword which he threatens to employ, like the British officer, but he wishes to cram his measure down the throats of the Senate.

Now, sir, I think it better that the Senate should proceed with this as it does with other matters, according to the regular order of business. There is the bankrupt bill, a practical measure, interesting to the whole commerce of this country, to every business man that there is from the east to the west and the north to the south. It is in charge of the Senator from Connecticut, who is taking time now on a measure destructive, as I solemnly believe, to the interests of his country, time which ought to be given to that other measure in which the commerce of the land is so largely involved.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the honorable Senator what he means by my taking time on this measure. I certainly have taken no time to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand the Senator to be insisting upon giving the time to Louisiana.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman's memory is wonderfully short. It is not six hours since I moved that the Senate fix the consideration of the bankrupt bill for seven o'clock this evening, and proceed with it during the evening.

Mr. SUMNER. That is true.

Mr. FOSTER. I pressed it upon the Senate against the opposition of the Senator from Illinois, although I said I agreed with the Senator from Illinois in the importance of his resolution; but I was desirous of getting the bill which the honorable Senator speaks of as having been delayed, before the Senate, not having an opportunity heretofore, unless I brought it in contact with the bill which the Senator has pressed here, and so familiarly known as the Camden and Amboy bill, which he has not had the charge of regularly, but one which he has exercised a kind of paternity over, and has asserted over and over that it must not give way to any bill. I saw the facility of antagonizing the bankrupt bill with that, and did not, but I did with this, hoping to get its consideration to-night. I failed; but I am not to be charged with it when I did all I could to succeed.

Mr. SUMNER. I am grateful to the Senator for the effort he made. My only regret is that he has not continued the effort, and that now, for I do not know how many votes, he has insisted upon keeping this other question before the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. If the honorable Senator will allow me, it is not my habit to continue to oppose the expressed will of a majority of the Senate of the United States of which I am a member. When the sense of the majority is deliberately and clearly expressed, I, perhaps very timidly and improperly, submit to it.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, let me be frank. I intend no criticism of the course of the Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly am perfectly willing to be the subject of the Senator's criticism. I only want the fact and the criticism to go together.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator wishes the fact and the criticism to go together. Well, sir, I wish the fact and the criticism to go together. If the question is to be one of controversy, I wish it to be known that the Senator, after having failed to have the bankrupt bill taken up, has cooperated lustily with those who are disposed to keep the Senate occupied by this other measure to the exclusion of the bankrupt bill.

I was presenting, or trying to present, to the Senate some of the important measures which are not yet acted upon, and which the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Connecticut unite in postponing in order to press this ill-omened measure. I said there was the bankrupt bill. The Senator from Connecticut has reminded me also of a bill in which I take an interest, known as the bill to regulate commerce among the States; a most important measure, of vital interest, I think, to every patriot in the land. That is a bill which has been steadfastly opposed by certain Senators by dilatory motions and by antagonizing other business. Though it was introduced at the last session, we have not yet been allowed to get a vote upon it; and the Senator from Illinois is partly responsible for that. He has opposed our getting a vote. And now, sir, here is his bantling, not a week old, that he is pressing upon the attention of the Senate. I think it would be better if the Senator would unite with us in passing that earlier measure that undertakes to regulate the internal commerce of the States; to pass the bill in charge of the Senator from Connecticut; to pass the tax bill; to pass the useful, beneficent measures that are before us; and forgetting that leaf from the earlier Senator from Illinois, cease to press an obnoxious measure and try to cram it down our throats. Sir, we all remember the fate of those efforts of the other Senator from Illinois; that notwithstanding his efforts and his boasts, his measure did not come to a vote for many long weeks. It was to be voted on the first twenty-four hours, then in forty-eight hours; we had solemn notice given us day by day, very much as the Senator from Illinois gives us notice on this other question; but they did not reach the vote for weeks, because the question was important, and there was in those days a certain liberty in the Senate, and it was exercised by Senators.

Mr. DOOLITTLE obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say a single word to my honorable friend from Massachusetts, and then I will give way to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. President. I have not been an indifferent spectator to the scenes we have witnessed here to-night. They are scenes which I wish the whole country could look in upon. I wish they could analyze these proceedings, and read over the names of the men who have been voting on these dilatory motions to prevent the Senate from coming to a vote upon what all regard as a very important measure. Men differ in their opinions, it is true, as to this measure, whether it should or should not pass; but all concede that it is an important measure. Now, sir, not to speak of those gentlemen who usually vote with the Opposition, but to confine myself entirely to those gentlemen who usually vote with the friends of the Administration, what do we see? There are but five who usually act with the Administration who are making and voting for these dilatory motions, and there are eighteen of the friends of the Administration opposed to them. These five, a small minority, not a third of the friends of the Administration on this floor, are making these dilatory motions and complaining because my friend from Illinois, who stands here in charge of this measure, and as we may say the representative of the friends of this measure, who when he speaks upon it speaks the voice of this Senate by a majority of almost two to one, desires to obtain a vote upon it. These men are presenting themselves here in this attitude. They say in substance, there shall be no vote to-night. The Senator from Massachusetts says that he will draw upon the whole arsenal of parliamentary opposition; that there can be no vote to-night; that the Senator from Illinois, in asking a vote to-night, is but sowing salt upon the sand and plowing it in; that it is of no consequence.

This is the attitude in which they stand; and at the same time they tell us they will not agree upon any time when a vote may be had. If these gentlemen are willing that the Senate should express its opinion, and will name the hour, or the evening, or the day when the vote may be taken; if they say they will desire to discuss it; that they think they can convince the Senate that its opinion is wrong, there will certainly be no opposition to postponing it, if it is desired, until Monday or Monday evening. There is no disposition to crowd men so that they shall not be permitted to speak. But, sir, here we have five men claiming to usurp an authority over the action of the friends of the Administration when there are eighteen voting against them on these motions solid; to say nothing of those honorable gentlemen who usually act with the opposition, and from whom of course we have no right to claim their support in relation to measures of this kind. They have not exhibited anything like faction. Many of them have voted steadily against these propositions to adjourn and these dilatory motions, because they believed it was right that the voice of the Senate should be taken upon the proposition, if it is ready to vote.

But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, though he says he is prepared to vote, because other Senators differ with him, presumes they are not prepared to vote. What arrogance, what assumed superiority on the part of one man over his equals and his peers on this floor to say that he is prepared to vote, but that other Senators are not prepared because they do not agree with him! Sir, I would to God the whole American people could look in upon this scene and upon the Senator from Massachusetts. That Senator more than once, because I have urged the admission of the free State of Louisiana, with a constitution which has been adopted by the vote of a large majority of her loyal people; a constitution which is loyal to the Union, and sets free in the districts which were excepted from the President's proclamation almost ninety thousand slaves, has charged me with standing in the march of human freedom; and yet he here, in season and out of season, is against the recognition of the free State of Louisiana and against a constitution which gives freedom to ninety thousand slaves and to all the slaves of Louisiana, whether the emancipation proclamation reached them or not, because, as he avowed last evening on the floor of the Senate, the constitution of Louisiana is not republican in form, inasmuch as that constitution does not guaranty suffrage to all the colored inhabitants of Louisiana.

He avowed also that it was the duty of Congress to guaranty a republican form of Government to every State in this Union; and therefore, as a necessary consequence of his doctrine, Congress ought to pass a law which should declare that the law of New York, which requires a qualification upon negro suffrage, should be abolished; that the law of New Jersey, the law of Pennsylvania, the law of Indiana, the law of Ohio, the law of Illinois, the law of almost every State in this Union, must be changed by a law of Congress, in order to guaranty to all the citizens of the several States a republican form of Government. This is the reason why he is opposed to this constitution and this State of Louisiana. He would break down the right of every State to judge upon its own suffrage. I would to Heaven the whole country could look in upon this scene. They would then see what has become of all this boastful pretense in favor of the real advancement of the freedom of the African, when the Senator is repeating these charges again and again against me, that I am standing in the way of the march of freedom. We have seen this factious performance here, and understand it all. We know what it means.

Mr. President, so far as any effort on my part, for one, is concerned, to undertake to prevent any gentleman from expressing his opinion just when he pleases, and just as long as he pleases, upon any measure pending, I demur to the charge altogether. I am perfectly willing that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] should go on to-night, or on Monday, or any other time, provided it may be understood that the majority of this Senate shall have the privilege of recording their votes on this question. That is all I ask, and all that the majority have a right to ask.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I do not like controversy. I am sorry always when I am engaged in it. I differ in that respect from the Senator from Wisconsin. He does like it. He is never so happy as when he is attacking somebody, and he is especially happy when he is attacking me. Senators will bear me witness that I never allude to that Senator unless in reply to him. He is perpetually alluding to me, and in an odious, I might say, almost a vindictive spirit. I say, sir, I do not like controversy; but I am ready to meet the Senator at any time.

The Senator—I wish to be parliamentary—has a monomania. Part of it is shown, as I have already said, in attacking me. He has another monomania, which he has shown too often during the last few years, which leads him to throw himself in the way of the march of human liberty. You have not forgotten how, when we were seeking to establish emancipation in this District, he insisted upon foisting an irrational scheme of colonization upon that beneficent measure; that he extorted from the good nature of the Senate an appropriation which ought never to have been made.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] moved an amendment to that bill to make a for the colonization of the negroes of this District that should be emancipated. I moved to amend it so that it should only be by their free and voluntary consent. I have already been misrepresented enough upon that subject by those newspapers that peculiarly sympathize with the Senator from Massachusetts; and I wish now to call the Senator's attention to that fact, that that was my amendment; and it was an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SUMNER. We all know that he was wedded to the irrational policy of colonization; wedded to an odious measure; and that under his lead we were induced to make an appropriation which afterward we were obliged to cancel.

You have not forgotten also how that Senator flung himself in the path of every proposition made during the last session against slavery; how he flung himself forward desperately in order to save the last relics of that atrocious fugitive slave bill; how he seemed to throw himself on the side of the slave hunter. And now, sir, during the present session, you have seen him, while declaring his support of the constitutional amendment, most zealously and sedulously advocating an interpretation of the Constitution which is to postpone the consummation of that amendment.

I do not doubt the sincerity of the Senator. I merely allude to these things to show the animus under which he acts. And now the Senator comes forward here to arraign me, and he sets up the fact that I cannot accept his ill-omened constitution from Louisiana; and he then, forthwith, goes off into a rhapsody on what that constitution has accomplished. Sir, that constitution was not necessary to the consummation which he indicates. Slavery in Louisiana had already ceased. It is not necessary that we should recognize this constitution in order to complete the work.

But the Senator has copied and repeated the speech of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] with regard to the guarantee in the Constitution of the United States. He says that I have assumed a position here which, if carried out, would require us to disfranchise New York, and perhaps Wisconsin, and other States. The Senator has not understood my position. The Senator from Missouri did not understand it last night; and the Senator from Wisconsin has simply imitated the Senator from Missouri. I tell him that the position which I took, and which at the proper time will be vindicated, leads to no such result. I will not go into the discussion of that question now. That is collateral; and I only allude to it now simply as another illustration of the disposition which seems to actuate the Senator from Wisconsin. If the guarantee of the Constitution is to be enforced, then I insist that we must look to the Declaration of Independence for the essential principles of a republican government.

Sir, I have always tried to cultivate friendly relations with that Senator. I have never said anything on earth that was unkind of him. I do not understand the animosity with which he seems to pursue me. I can only account for it as a part of that monomania which made him link himself with the slave power.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts supposes that I have the slightest animosity toward him personally he is the most mistaken man that ever lived. I never had in my heart a thought or feeling of animosity toward that Senator. But in relation to some of his positions, I have attacked them with severity. I shall continue to do so as long as I believe them to be as dangerous as I think they are.

Mr. SUMNER. Anything for freedom is dangerous to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to myself, personally, I have never spoken of nor arraigned the Senator, except in reply to him, when he has arraigned me in his speeches as being opposed to freedom; that the animus which governs me is in opposition to freedom, and in sympathy with slavery and slaveholders. Of that the Senate can judge; the people who know me can judge; and my whole life and history on this subject is, perhaps, known to some of my friends and to the country.

Mr. President, I do say this: that, in my opinion, nine tenths of all the judges and all the lawyers and all the men of common sense in the United States this day will maintain that in order to adopt a constitutional amendment which shall be binding upon all the States of this Union the Constitution requires the assent of the States. The idea of the Senator that three fourths of all you can get to vote for the amendment will carry it and make it operative upon those you cannot get to vote for it, and the very States that are interested in the question and whose interests and rights are to be controlled by it, is, to my mind, a monstrous proposition.

I believe, and therefore say, that the Senator from Massachusetts, in bringing the weight of his name and all his influence to bear to prevent a free State from being recognized, to prevent its representatives being brought into the two Houses of Congress, and the State recognized in every form necessary to give validity to its action and vote on the constitutional amendment, is taking a position in opposition to freedom. Therefore, it is without any animosity toward the Senator from Massachusetts or the slightest unkind feeling in the world, I undertake to say that the position which he takes and maintains here is in opposition to the advance of freedom; that it stands in its march; that it stands in the way of the adoption of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. No.
Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator shakes his head and says no. Suppose his opinion is right, that the constitutional amendment might be adopted by less than three fourths of all the States of the Union—

Mr. SUMNER. Nineteen States.
Mr. DOOLITTLE. By nineteen States, instead of twenty-seven. Suppose he believes that, and suppose by possibility he were correct in that opinion, still, in order to have it placed beyond doubt or cavil, so that the question cannot be raised in a court or anywhere else, so that there shall be no doubt on the subject, is it not of consequence to obtain the votes and the consent of twenty-seven States?

Mr. SUMNER. I would obtain the consent of all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there will be no misunderstanding between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself. He has never provoked in me any personal animosity. I have never given utterance to the least expression of personal animosity toward that Senator. I have attacked his positions; and when the Senator has sometimes undertaken, in his attack on my position, to charge me with being in sympathy with slavery and that I am opposed to freedom, I have replied and arraigned his positions, and have attacked them, and it was right to do so. It was just as much my right to arraign his positions as for him to arraign mine. I do not assert any superiority over that Senator. I have no right to do so; and everybody would know that it would be a miserable assumption on my part to attempt it.

But I am not willing to be arraigned by the Senator as being in sympathy with slaveholding and against freedom; and I tell that Senator now that on this very subject of colonization he has persistently, by what he has said, misrepresented—I do not say willfully—my position. I never sought by word or deed to give force to any law whatever which would in the slightest degree, against the will and the free voluntary consent of any person, cause his emigration, or his colonization, or his deportation anywhere. I would open to the free colored men just as free emigration to go from this country as I would open up to persons from Europe to come here. The Senator cannot oppose the positions which I have taken on that subject and at the same time state them correctly as I make them.

But, Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say. I do not want that Senator to understand that I have any animosity toward him. I have not the slightest in the world toward him or toward any Senator on this floor. I do not love controversy for the sake of controversy. That I advocate measures, that I take positions, that I am earnest in what I do, and earnest in what I say and in what I feel, I do not deny; but there is no hostility toward individuals and no personal feeling intermixed, none whatever.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I tried to get the floor to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts; but I feel very little inclination to do it now. I think enough has been said. The Senator certainly, in his cooler moments, would not consider it just to impute to me a disposition to cram a measure and force it, when the suggestion I made was that we should take it up at the next meeting of the Senate and proceed with it, not checking anybody in debate, but simply that he and those acting with him should not make a factious opposition, should not make dilatory motions. When I asked him if he was willing to let it go over, and let us take it up and proceed with it on another day until we finish it, each person taking as much time as he pleased, but simply with an understanding that he should not resort to the artillery of parliamentary motions to defeat it, he called that "cramping!"

Now, sir, it is manifest, from the disposition which has exhibited itself here on the part of a few, and which looks to me a little like factious opposition, that we can get no vote to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. I told you so some hours ago.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. If there is a faction standing here to defeat the will of the Senate I think the Senate will not be disposed to weary itself with an opposition of that kind, but would rather take another day to endeavor to pass the resolution which a few will stand in the way of action upon to-night. I shall not resist a motion to adjourn when I see this disposition of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, like the Senator from Wisconsin, I have not been an inattentive observer of the proceedings of this night's session. The discordant elements of the Republican party are exhibiting themselves here; and I venture the prophecy that a like exhibition will be witnessed over the country within a very few years. But four years ago, at the Chicago convention, when Mr. Lincoln was nominated for the Presidency, a solemn pledge was made to the people of this country that that party, when it came into power, would not undertake to interfere with the institutions of the States. As soon as the disturbed condition of the country gave the pretext for it, the undertaking was commenced; and now, when, in the judgment of some, it has been accomplished, there comes up the grave question, what is to be done, and what is to be the political condition of the four million negroes when they are set free? And upon that question the real strife of to-night has been witnessed. That is the subject, and it need not be disguised. It is growing out of the discordant elements of the party that now governs the country.

The Democracy here to-night have favored the consideration of the resolution that is before the body. We have not sought to defeat legislation. And how does it come that in the harmonious majority we see this clash of arms in the hands of its magnates, not with us? We are content to be the quiet observers of the controversy. I welcome the strife as a harbinger of a return to those principles that will yet save this country.

I am ready to go on to-night in the discussion of this measure, and am ready to vote against it to-night; or rather to abstain from voting, if the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. VAN WINKLE] does not get here. If he is here on Monday I shall be ready to give my vote after a very few remarks upon the resolution.

But, sir, the lessons of to-night have been instructive. There is a strife here; and it is not a strife between gentlemen. Senators are too honorable to have a personal controversy. It is a strife of principle; and the question is, what is to be done with the four million negroes when they are set free? There are Senators upon the Republican side who feel that it is a very troublesome question. That is the trouble here to-night. It is not whether a particular measure shall be considered; but that very thing; and I think the Democracy will eventually have some gains from gentlemen who will not go the extreme doctrine. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is determined that none of these States shall ever be heard in the Halls of Congress until the men who speak from those States speak the voice of the negroes as well as of the white men. Other Senators say that shall not be. We Democrats are a unit upon that question. We believe in the sentiment of the illustrious Senator formerly occupying a seat in this body from Illinois, that this Government was made by white men for white men, and we expect to stand by that idea. Let the controversy go on. The Senators and the Republicans over the country who wish to elevate the negro to an equality, political and social, and civil and legal, with the white man, will have their controversy with Senators and Republicans who entertain sentiments with the Senator from Wisconsin, who do not believe that the condition of the negro in the South is such as entitles him to control the legislation and policy of this great country.

Now, Mr. President, if it is in order, I will renew the motion I proposed a while ago, that this resolution be made the order of the day for Monday evening at eight o'clock, and then I hope we can come together to dispose of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We had better adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the bill that has come from the House increasing the taxes is the order of the day for one o'clock on Monday, and of course that cannot be displaced by this measure.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, this resolution will supersede it if we adjourn now, because it will be the unfinished business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not willing to submit a motion that will supersede that bill. I do not know whether that bill has got any merits. It is a bill we will all feel when it comes. It is a bill that claims attention, either for passage or defeat; and I do not know which. It is doubtful whether I shall vote for it; but we shall see when it is considered and discussed. It is very clear, I think, that the Senate will not consent that that bill shall lose its position for this, because this measure will hardly become a law at this session at any rate. It is a Senate measure, and the House of Representatives will hardly pass it at this session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think they will.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it will be passed through that body without some conversation. I think there are some gentlemen over there who will have some remarks to make about it. I have heard some of them say so. As it has taken this body, a small body, some time to come to anything like a conclusion, it will take that body, being a larger one, a good deal longer time. I think it is a very liberal proposition now that this measure shall be the order of the day for eight o'clock on Monday evening, and I think the Senator from Illinois ought to consent to that proposition. I have voted with him to secure a vote to-night, and I believe every Democrat here almost has voted so as to have the question taken to-night if possible. Now, I propose as a compromise that we make it the order of the day for eight o'clock on Monday evening, and we can have the hour between seven and eight for private bills and little matters that Senators wish to bring up.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THURSH, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, its Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution, of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 380) supplemental to the act approved 1st July, 1864, for the disposal of coal lands and of town property in the public domain; and Joint resolution (S. No. 118) to authorize surveys to be made with a view to the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, and improve the navigation of the Illinois river; to improve the upper rapids and lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river; and to improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following House bill, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending the 30th June, 1866.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending the payment of $6,818 30 to certain Indian tribes, out of the sales of their lands; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar discharged from the consideration of a very meritorious bill for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee. It is House bill No. 463. It is a very peculiar case, and one which commends itself very strongly to the favor of the House. I ask that it be taken up and disposed of now. It comes here at the very urgent solicitation of Governor Johnson, of Tennessee.

The bill was read for information.

It provides for the appropriation of $15,000 to pay Ambrose Morrison for his house and lot, in the city of Nashville, Tennessee, the same having been taken and used by the military authorities of the United States for the erection of permanent fortifications, provided, that before the money is paid, a good title to the lot shall be conveyed to the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this is one of a very large class of cases, involving, I think, one of the most important principles which we are called upon to consider.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is not a parallel case to this before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object to the bringing of the bill before the House, if I am permitted to offer an amendment, providing that this case shall not be considered a precedent for future action.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill come before the House, and I will not object to an amendment being offered.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar were discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 463) for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville Tennessee; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make no further argument than to ask that the Clerk read the following very brief report, made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] at the last session:

The Clerk read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial and accompanying papers of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee, report:

That the memorialist presents a claim for the value of a house and lot taken possession of by the military authorities of Nashville, Tennessee, for the purpose of erecting permanent fortifications thereon.

It appears that, in order to defend Nashville against the rebel army, it was deemed necessary to erect fortifications, and on the 4th day of May, 1863, the memorialist was notified by "George Burroughs, lieutenant of engineers," to vacate his house, when it was taken down and his grounds occupied by the fortifications.

A board of appraisers was duly appointed by the commanding officer, Brigadier General J. D. Morgan, consisting of Colonel A. C. Gillem, first Tennessee infantry; Edward H. East, secretary of State; and A. V. S. Lindsley, for the purpose of estimating the damages, and whose award is made a part of this report.

Among the many claims before your committee this is one of the few so well established by indisputable testimony that they have no doubt of its merit.

The agents of the Government, deeming it a military necessity, deliberately take possession of his property and appoint commissioners of their own choosing to place a value upon it. There would seem but little left for Congress to do in the premises but to appropriate the requisite amount of money to pay the award of the appraisers. Aside from the justice of this claim, it is one of those cases that appeal directly to the sympathies of those having the power to relieve the distressed.

The most prominent loyal men of Nashville, including Governor Andrew Johnson, represent that Mr. Morrison is an invalid of several years' standing, being paralyzed and unable to walk or stand erect. That he has a wife and five children, the oldest only sixteen years of age, entirely dependent upon him for their support and education, and that the property taken by the Government was his sole dependence, and they earnestly urge immediate measures for his relief.

The whole sum found due to Mr. Morrison by said board of appraisers is $16,354 90. Your committee are of the opinion that the general depreciation of property in that section of the country requires some deduction from the amount thus allowed by said board, and believing that $15,000 would be no more than a just compensation for the property so taken, report a bill for that sum; and respectfully recommend its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend this bill by adding thereto the following:

And provided further, That this act shall not be regarded as establishing a precedent for paying claims of a character involving the payment of claims growing out of the casualties of war.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move that the order establishing a morning hour, to the exclusion of regular business, shall be rescinded, so as to leave us in the condition of a regular morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The order having been made by unanimous consent, it would require a motion to suspend the rules, if any objection is made.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to suspend the rules for that purpose. We cannot get through our business unless we use the morning hour as a general thing. Of course it does not inevitably give the Committee of Ways and Means the morning hour, but it gives us the power hereafter to use it, if necessary.

Mr. HALE. We want to use this morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose to use this morning hour, but to rescind the order after to-day.

Mr. HALE. Then I think we better dispose of that question when the morning arrives.

Mr. STEVENS. If we do that, we will not know how to regulate our business. I move to suspend the rules, so as to rescind the order for the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the rules were suspended.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to rescind the order by which a morning hour was made imperative every day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOW. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means Senate bill No. 359, to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys advanced to the United States.

Mr. HALE. I must object. I demand the regular order of business.

JOSIAH COPELAND.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 793) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent of Josiah Copeland for a new and useful improvement in boot-crimps, which was read the third time on yesterday.

Mr. L. MYERS called the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I hope that the yeas and nays will be ordered, as I think that the principle of the bill is wrong.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 56, nays 38, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, Hale, Harding, Herrick, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Orr, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Smithers, Stevens, Strouse, Thayer, Tracy, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, and Worthington—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Boutwell, Cobb, Cole, Denison, Eckley, Edgerton, Grider, Higby, Holman, Hutchins, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Law, Long, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Pendleton, Perham, Ross, Sloan, Thomas, Townsend, Upson, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, English, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Whaley, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—88.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that Mr. STARR was absent on account of illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. L. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the SPEAKER signed the same:

An act (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce.

DELIA JACOBS.

Mr. CHANLER. I am directed by the Committee on Patents to report a bill to refer to the Commissioner of Patents the application of Delia Jacobs for the renewal of a patent for dressing treenails. This patent has only run for fourteen years, and it is entitled to run seven years more under the law; but on account of a mistake on the part of the memorialist the Commissioner refused to grant the extension.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the bill up.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. CHANLER. A treenail is a boat-nail made of locust wood, for the purpose of fastening the timbers of ships. The patent was originally granted in 1849, and expired in 1856. If required, I will have the memorial read. She failed to show by affidavit to the Commissioner of Patents that she was administratrix of the patentee, and under the law, failing to make that affidavit, the Commissioner refused to make the extension. The patent has not run twenty-one years yet, to which it is entitled to run. I have seen the Commissioner of Patents on the subject, and he says that he remembers the facts of the case, and that the allegations of the memorialist are true. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that we will not be called upon to vote for the extension of all the patents in the country without discussion.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw the demand for the previous question. I am willing to answer any question, or to furnish all the information desired by gentlemen in regard to this case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the memorial be read.

The memorial was read for information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think I understand from the memorial that this case is about this: this patent was issued in 1849, the party to whom it was issued died, and the widow sold out all her right, title, and interest, and got about a thousand dollars for it.

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Seventeen hundred dollars net.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Seventeen hundred dollars net the gentleman from Kentucky says. No application was made for a renewal of the patent, and now the widow comes here, apparently with the collusion of the party to whom the patent was assigned, to speculate out of Congress by getting a renewal.

Mr. CHANLER. The memorial sets forth that an application for a renewal was filed, and that everything was done that could be done by the party to secure an extension.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why did they wait eight years? Now they come here and say the invention is of great value, and ask us to impose a tax upon our constituents and place the avails in the hands of the assignee. I am opposed to this class kind of legislation. Let us legislate on such matters by a general law and not by these special acts.

And again, according to the statement of the gentleman from New York he has seen the Commissioner of Patents on this matter, who has prejudged it, and if we pass this bill the patent will be renewed anyhow.

Mr. JENCKES. This is a bill to correct an error in the office of the Commissioner of Patents. The proper evidence was on file, but it was overlooked by the Commissioner of Patents in his decision on the case; and without the action of Congress this petitioner will be without remedy.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York whether the patent is still in force.

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir.

Mr. DAWES. How long since it expired?

Mr. CHANLER. In 1853.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the patent expired in 1856, and I would inquire of the gentleman what has been the condition of the manufacture of the article since that time. Have not parties, availing themselves of the freedom of this invention from a patent, gone into the manufacture of the article?

Mr. CHANLER. I know nothing in reference to that matter. I only know this case as presented in the memorial. I have no knowledge of the manufacture or of the trade in this article.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire if this bill in any way protects those who may have gone into the manufacture of the article recently, and since the patent expired?

Mr. CHANLER. I am not aware that it does.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know what the facts are, but men may have invested their property in the manufacture of this article, free and open to everybody; and does the gentleman think it right to spring a patent upon them now?

Mr. CHANLER. I should think it was not right, and it was not my object to do that.

Mr. DAWES. I should infer, if this was a valuable invention and worthy of a patent, that its manufacture must have been gone into during the last eight years; and if it has gone into general use, the gentleman ought, at least, to protect those now manufacturing the article.

Mr. CHANLER. It might be well to do so. My object was to do my duty in making a report according to the instructions of the committee; and I have reported the bill in the form usual in such cases. It can be amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I feel some regret in being compelled to state my objection to this system of extending patents upon this little bill. It is a widow's bill, apparently, and a very little bill at that. Her whole interest in it is $300, which her assignees have agreed to give her if we shall extend the monopoly seven years longer. But the bill illustrates the system. I am prepared now to exhibit the generosity of a great people toward any meritorious inventor, and to the family of any meritorious inventor, who have not reaped a reward from an invention important to mankind, sufficient to place them beyond the reach of want.

Let the meritorious inventor come to Congress, and show a proper exceptional case for our action, and I will not object to voting for his relief. But I will in no instance vote to extend a monopoly over thirty million people simply to fill the pockets of vendors and assignees and traders who have reaped the benefits of that invention. In nine cases out of ten, as in this case, the persons really interested in the extension of the patent are the assignees of the patentee; those persons who have had in their hands and reaped the benefit of the patent during the greater part of the fourteen years for which these monopolies run, while the inventor and his family have received comparatively nothing. These assignees appeal to the sympathies of members of Congress in order to procure an extension of the monopoly for seven years, and in the sacred name of widow and orphan.

Now, it is with the profoundest regret that I have seen the members of this House so generally indifferent to this thing. I am prepared to concede that the inventor ought to have a monopoly in the first instance, for some sufficient, fixed term; let it be so. But I do most cordially indorse the policy of the act of 1861, which declared that hereafter patents should be granted for seventeen years, and that there should be no extension of such patents. That is a sound policy, and now will this Congress break down the policy established by the act of 1861? I am very sorry that the Committee on Patents do not look at it in that way. I am sorry they do not discourage these applications, and do not propose to confine the action of Congress to the policy of 1861, denying severely the extension of patents in all cases.

Mr. CHANLER. Is the gentleman opposed to granting patents, and if not, for how long would he have them granted?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For fourteen years, under the old law; for seventeen years, under the act of 1861.

Mr. CHANLER. This patent has run only fourteen years, and the party, under the old law, is entitled to an extension of seven years. But by no fault of his the application was delayed too long. This is not an application to extend a patent beyond the time allowed by the law. It simply allows the lawful extension of the patent, which failed through the omission on the part of the paid attorney to do his duty. And the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] amounts to this: that for the purpose of making an argument, which covers thirty-one million people, he insists that a just law shall not be carried out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I differ with the gentleman about the law. We have no statute, and never had a statute, which, as a matter of right, gives an extension for seven years. We have simply a statute which confers on the Commissioner of Patents a discretion to extend a patent for seven years, when it shall be shown, among other things, that the inventor has not reaped a sufficient reward for his invention, by no fault of his, during the fourteen years for which the patent was originally granted.

Mr. CHANLER. This is exactly just such a case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Commissioner is to extend the patent when it shall appear, among other things, that the invention is novel, useful, and important, and that the inventor has not derived a sufficient reward for his time, talents, and expenditures, in perfecting the invention. It simply vests a discretion in the Commissioner, the presumption being always that the inventor has received his reward, and that his monopoly should cease. He must make out a case, and show that he has not received it, and by no fault of his. The act of 1861 is a step in advance, which I do not think the House should recede from. That act renounced the policy of extension, and made the term of the patent seventeen instead of fourteen years.

I was remarking, when interrupted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] that this policy of renewing patents is altogether vicious. Suppose the patent is a valuable one, worth millions. The Goodyear patent, for instance, in which there are millions of dollars involved. It opens a door to every sort of fraud and rascality to allow such vast private interests to haunt the rooms of the Patent Office, or cumber the lobby of Congress, invade even the rooms of members, and subsidize the press, taking the names of widow and orphans in vain to procure a new lease of power over mankind.

A patent worth several million dollars can fight its way through the Department and through Congress in the face of the vital interests of the public; and as a general thing nobody wants an extension of a patent unless it is in such common use as to lay under contribution millions of people. The greater the utility of the invention the greater the slavery to which the monopoly subjects the mass of the people. I do not know but that, in the progress of invention, some man may invent something which, if he be allowed a monopoly of it for fourteen years even may give him for that period a controlling power over mankind too great for the public safety. Suppose that a man should invent something that would wonderfully cheapen the means of subsistence beyond all hitherto achieved, that would put within the reach of everybody elegant and refined but cheap means of subsistence, what a vast power over mankind could be wielded by that inventor, under his monopoly, for fourteen years! What desperate and dangerous expedients aimed at the administrative officers and the legislative body in such cases does this thoughtless policy of extensions invite!

As is most frequently the case, the inventor, exalted or lost in the rapture of invention, becomes the victim of some scheming trader, who reaps the millions that the invention produces. At the end of the term for which the patent was granted, an application is made for an extension. The poverty of the inventor, contrasted with the benefactions his genius has added to the sum of good, is pleaded before the Department and before Congress. An extension is granted, and that extension inures to the benefit, not of the inventor or his widow or children, but of some person or persons who have already grown fat by turning into commodity the necessities of mankind. The principle is wrong. It is the most wasteful and oppressive of modes for removing the poverty of the inventor. To give his widow a pittance we put mankind into circumscription, and levy millions from their necessities. Rather let us double the pittance and set free the business of mankind.

The extension of the patent in this case will probably give to the widow of the inventor about three hundred dollars. Now, sir, if this invention is meritorious, and a proper remuneration for it has never been received by the inventor, but his widow and children are in poverty, let us vote the widow $1,000 and liberate from restriction the ship-building of this country. I think it much better that we should do this than grant an extension of the patent, from which the widow would derive $300, while the profits of the extension levied off the people of the country, to a large amount perhaps, will go into the hands of some, it may be, mercenary assignee. In no case would I grant an extension of a patent after the expiration of the term of fourteen years. Yet to the benefactor of the race, or his family, destitute, notwithstanding the blessings his devotion and genius had dispensed, I would manifest, by a fitting testimonial from the Treasury, the gratitude of the people.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reply to the position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WADSWORTH.] He has, as I understand, stated distinctly in his last remarks that, under no circumstances would he agree that a patent should be extended after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years. Yet he admits that there may be made an invention for the value of which to the community the inventor cannot be remunerated by the use of that invention for fifty years.

Now, sir, let me submit a case, for which I ask the consideration of the gentleman from Kentucky, and all who are to act upon this question, and who may be called upon to act on the proposed amendment to the patent laws. Suppose that a valuable invention is patented; that at the expiration of the original term of fourteen years the inventor makes application for a renewal of the patent, under the laws that existed prior to 1861; that he makes out a perfectly just case for extension, showing that he has failed to receive proper remuneration for his invention. There are cases in which the inventor is obliged to part with his interest in the invention during the original term for a very small consideration. There may be, and there are, as we know, cases in which the inventor is unable to introduce an invention during the original term, and even during the extended term. There may be cases in which the inventor has been defrauded out of his patent for the original term. Yet he may be unable to make out at the Patent Office a case entitling him to an extension, under the law of 1861.

Gentlemen will remember that under that law the application for an extension must be made during the original term. Frequently applications have been made very near the expiration of the original term. There was, too, a very stringent provision in reference to the time within which the decision of the Commissioner should be made.

The case here presented is this: a perfect case was made before the Commissioner of Patents, the only officer under this Government having the right to grant an extension of patents. He overlooked a portion of the evidence actually on file. He has since certified that if he had had knowledge of the existence of that evidence his decision would have been different. The fact that he overlooked it is presumptive evidence that his action worked injustice. In the present state of the law there is no power, no officer under the Government, who can correct a mistake of that kind. It comes here just as a motion for a new trial would come before a court. We are the court of correction for this kind of errors. We ought to have another and a different kind, I agree, but we are that court as the law stands.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put a case to the gentleman from Rhode Island to ascertain the precise position which the Commissioner of Patents takes on this point. Suppose a man parts with his property in a patent voluntarily for a consideration less than it has proved to be worth, either because he did not himself comprehend its true value, or from necessity he was compelled to part with it for a small sum, and that his assignees, deriving title from his voluntary act, have made immense fortunes out of it, I ask whether he stands in any other position than any other man who parts with his property for a less sum than that property is worth. I ask whether the Commissioner on Patents proposes to extend to the original patentee the further use and monopoly of his patent upon the ground that the patentee himself has been unable to realize a remuneration sufficient to him compared with the vast benefits to the Government, while the assignees, by his voluntary act, have reaped a rich harvest.

Mr. CHANLER. I must renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JENCKES. I wish to say that the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts is based on a misapprehension of the law under which a patent can be extended.

Mr. CHANLER. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the bill be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 38.

Mr. BRANDEGEE demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution to correct an error in the report of a committee of conference.

There was no objection.

Mr. HIGBY. The object of the resolution is to dispose of the first amendment made to the bill in reference to the United States courts in Nevada. The conference committee were unanimous in retaining that amendment, and intended that it should be a part of their report, but it was unintentionally omitted in the written report. The adoption of this resolution will supply that omission.

Mr. KERNAN. The amendment is merely one of phraseology, and I hope that the resolution will be adopted, as a mistake was made.

The resolution was adopted.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I am directed by the Committee, on Printing to report the following resolution; and on its adoption I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed one hundred and twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1864 for the use of the House, and twenty thousand copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture; twenty thousand of them to be printed on fifty-pound paper, and the engravings to be interspersed through the volume in their proper places.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman will yield to me to move to reduce the number for the Commissioner of Agriculture to fifteen thousand.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 17; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. A. W. CLARK and HOLMAN.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the number for the Commissioner of Agriculture to fifteen thousand, and to add five thousand to the other number.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I am satisfied that the Commissioner, in the proper conduct of his Department, will need all that we have reported to give him, and I therefore hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. If there were a proposition to abolish the Department of Agriculture that would present another question, and what is said against voting copies of the report for the use of the Department might be pertinent in the speeches of those gentlemen who might favor that proposition; but we have now before us merely the question of carrying on the Department in a proper manner; and I insist that we ought to do what the case requires, what our self-respect requires, and what the interest of the Department requires.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I renew my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the amendment was adopted, and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR HICKS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the eulogies on Senator Hicks, delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the business next in order is the enrollment bill, which comes up as unfinished business from yesterday.

BOUNDARY OF NEVADA.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada in reference to the eastern boundary of said State; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF MISSOURI.

Mr. BLOW. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it is to consume any time or evoke discussion I must object, and insist upon the regular order.

Mr. BLOW. I wish to report back Senate bill No. 359, to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States. I wish it printed and made a special order for next Tuesday.

Mr. SCHENCK. That subject is before the Committee on Military Affairs, who have some considerable information in regard to it, and I suppose the committee are about ready to report.

Mr. STEVENS. We only ask that we may report this bill and refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not understand how the subject got before that committee. It seems to me it is one of these side blows against the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLOW. It is a Senate bill unanimously reported from the Military Committee of the Senate, and passed by the Senate unanimously. It came to this House, and was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. All I ask is that it may be reported, made the special order for next Tuesday, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. How much money does it appropriate?

Mr. BLOW. Four million dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to its being made a special order.

No further objection being made, the bill was reported, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, and by unanimous consent, the Army appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ENLISTMENT OF REBEL PRISONERS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House whether rebel prisoners at Rock Island, Illinois, have been enlisted into our service, and credited to one or more States; and if so, how many have been so enlisted and credited, and when, and to what States; and also whether any of said persons so credited are still under guard at Rock Island.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution, and make the inquiry general.

Mr. PIKE. I will do so. The Clerk can make the necessary modification.

Mr. GANSON. I suggest also that he include an inquiry whether bounties have been paid.

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to that. I understand bounties have been paid, and that the prisoners so credited are still under guard. I modify my amendment so as to include that inquiry.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I have given way to so many persons to introduce resolutions, I will now give way to myself, [laughter,] and ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House whether any military order or regulation has been issued prohibiting negroes or colored persons from leaving the city of Washington or the District of Columbia without a pass; and if so, whether such order or regulation is still in force; and that he furnish in that case a copy or copies of any such order or regulation, with an explanation of the reason for making such distinction on account of color.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the resolution at this time.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 85, noes 9.

So, two-thirds voting in favor thereof—the rules were suspended.

Mr. SCHENCK moved the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. SHERMAN, GRIMES, and HENDRICKS the committee on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask permission of the House for the Committee of Ways and Means to present a matter which will take but a moment, at the special request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SCHENCK. And I am pressing the enrollment bill at the special request of the Secretary of War. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio as declining to yield.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft; the question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] to strike out the sixth section, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sixteenth section of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, is hereby so amended as to allow to the provost marshals appointed under the provisions of that act the same commutation for fuel and quarters as is allowed to other officers ranking as captains of cavalry; but the provost marshal, surgeon, and commissioner, constituting the enrolling board, shall not, in any case, be allowed mileage, but only transportation in kind, or the actual cost of their traveling on duty from their respective places of residence to the district headquarters and returning therefrom, or to and from such other points as they may be by law required to attend at officially within the limits of the district. There shall also be paid by the order of the Secretary of War, on proper vouchers, all actual, necessary, and reasonable expenses of office rent, postage, stationery, and clerk-hire.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire the House to observe the character of that section. It is simply to increase the pay of provost marshals of districts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that debate is exhausted on the proposition.

The question being on the amendment, the Speaker ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and KERNAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 57.

Mr. KERNAN. I call for the yeas and nays. If we are going to increase the pay of these officers, I want to know who is in favor of it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 78, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Flinch, Ganson, Harding, Herrick, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, McKinney, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Pike, Price, Pruy, Radford, Scofield, Scott, John B. Steele, Thomas, Townsend, Wadsworth, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marey, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, and Worthington—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Eckley, English, Grinnell, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Lazear, LeBlond, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Morrill, Patterson, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Stuart, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—53.

So the House refused to strike out the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend the section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That surgeons of the boards of enrollment shall be entitled to the pay and allowances, including commutations for quarters and fuel, now allowed by law to assistant surgeons in the Army; and that the commissioners of such boards shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and commutations allowed to first lieutenants of cavalry.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not debatable. Debate is closed on the section and on all amendments thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the seventh section, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President an assistant provost marshal general for each State, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry, or an officer in service may be detailed for that position whose rank is not less than major or above a colonel. Such assistant provost marshal generals shall be under the direction and subject to the orders of the Provost Marshal General, and shall be charged with the duties intermediate between the Provost Marshal General and the district provost marshals: Provided, however, That when a State comprises but one congressional district there shall be no assistant provost marshal general for such State, but the duties shall be performed by the provost marshal of the district.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend by insert ing the following as a new section, to come in between sections seven and eight:

And be it further enacted, That when hereafter calls shall be made for men for the military service of the United States, the quotas of the several States shall be, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the population, excluding Indians, of the States respectively.

As the law now stands, Mr. Speaker, quotas are determined by the number of men between the ages of twenty and forty-five able to bear arms. I believe that it is just that the quotas should be assigned to the States in proportion to their population. Population gives representation in the Federal Government. The war is waged for the defense of this Government, and I think that it is just that the men required for military service should be in the same proportion. If gentlemen will look at the population of the States and ascertain the quotas assigned to each under the calls for men which have been made by the President, they will see a result that is palpably unjust. Some of the new States, where the population is largely of young laboring men, furnish two and three times as many men in proportion to their population as some of the old States do. I wished to state to the House exactly the quota assigned to each State under the calls which have heretofore been made; and with a view of being able to do so, I this morning went to the War Department, and requested to be furnished the aggregate quota of each State under each of these calls. The information was refused. I was told that one or both Houses of Congress had called for that information, and that it had been refused. I stated that I desired the information with a view to legislation pending; nevertheless, it was refused. It seems, therefore, we must act without it.

I therefore can only call to the minds of gentlemen what they can remember of the quotas, and cannot state them with accuracy. Take Massachusetts, with a population of 1,231,000, and the State of Iowa, with a population of 674,000, and look at their respective quotas, and say whether those quotas are just or not. Should these burdens be thus apportioned? New York has a population of 3,800,000, about three times the population of Massachusetts, yet in the assignment of the last call for troops the quota of New York was some sixty-six thousand, while gentlemen will remember how small was the quota of Massachusetts. It was nothing like in proportion to its population. This is unjust, and the law which produces such results should be changed. The fair way is to assign the quota to each State according to its population.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Suppose that in any one State there are twice as many women as men, and in another State twice as many men as women; and that this disproportion has been caused by the emigration of men from the former State to the latter; would the gentleman still insist that the quota to each State should be in proportion to the population?

Mr. KERNAN. This raising of men has become a mere matter of taxation, a mere matter of raising money, and if a State is wealthy from its manufactures, from the employment of women and children in its factories, it should be taxed to raise men in proportion to its population and wealth; the burden of furnishing men should not be cast mainly upon new States, where every man almost has a family dependent upon his labor for support, and where they cannot raise money to purchase substitutes, as in the old and wealthy States. The States have representation and influence in the affairs of Government according to their population; I believe it is but right that they should bear the burdens which are imposed upon the country in defense of the Government in proportion to their representation. Their representation in the Army should be in proportion to their representation in Congress and other branches of the Government, particularly when it is only a question of raising money to give bounties to volunteers.

I regret that I am not able to lay before the House the exact quotas of the several States under each call, that gentlemen might see them. I have a recollection, from reading the statement in the newspapers, that they seemed to me to be very unequal and unjust. But it seems the majority will not insist that we shall have such information when called for by resolution of the House, and when a member goes to the Department and asks for it he is told that it will not be furnished to him, although he states that he wants to use it in the House in relation to a bill then under consideration. That was the reply I received at the Department this morning when I applied for this information.

Mr. GANSON. Why will not the gentleman join with me and others to bring up the bill and pass it, to bring the heads of Departments upon the floor, so that we can compel them to give us the information we want?

Mr. KERNAN. I very much desire that in the mode suggested or by some other means we may be able to get information from the Departments on subjects upon which we are required to legislate; we are not able, it seems, to do so now. No evil can come from the people or their Representatives having accurate information as to the system now in force. But gentlemen will remember the quotas of the States sufficiently to enable them to judge of the injustice of the law in force, and the propriety of the proposed change in the law. I submit that it is just and right under our Government that the quotas of the several States should be in proportion to their population.

Again, the present system gives opportunities for fraud and favoritism. The enrollment is made in each district by the enrolling officers. If for any reason they wish to make the quota of a district small they can greatly diminish the number of men enrolled, and the quota will be diminished. In another district, where they desire to make it high, they can make it so. It seems to have been so, because in New York, in one congressional district, we have seen the quota running up as high as four thousand, while in another district it has been as low as eleven or twelve hundred; and I believe that this arose from the fact that there was an effort to increase the enrollment list in one district and to diminish it in another. Base the quotas on population, and we can have them fairly assigned. Do not base them on enrollments made up by officers having oftentimes a desire in one case to make the quota larger than it ought to be, and in another to make it smaller.

It seems to me, therefore, first, that this proposition is just as between the States; and secondly that it will prevent favoritism, fraud, or any unfairness whatever in getting at the quota which each portion of the country shall contribute to the Army.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York is radical in its nature. It presents an entirely new basis for representation in the military service of the country. Instead of taking our soldiers from among the able-bodied men within certain ages, liable to military duty, in proportion to their number, the gentleman proposes that they shall be taken in a proportion having reference to the whole population of the district. This being an altogether novel proposition, contemplating a serious innovation, it is entitled to respectful consideration. Now, sir, the nation is in many respects like a family. If a house be attacked, although the women and children might perhaps do some little in the way of defense, yet I believe it is generally conceded that the defense of that household ought to fall upon the able-bodied men of the family. I think it is much the same with regard to the nation when attacked in its integrity, that those who muster to its defense ought to be expected to be drawn from the able-bodied male population. And surely, if the gentleman's amendment should prevail, he cannot object to my proposing, as I shall certainly do, an amendment that hereafter all able-bodied women between the ages of sixteen and forty shall be subject to enrollment and draft.

It occurs to me that the gentleman cannot well have considered his proposition. I know that if such a proposition should become the law of the land, we in the western States, where the males hold a greater proportion to the entire population than in the eastern States and in New England, would profit by such a change in the law. But, as a Representative of a western and interior State, I am not to be bribed to favor such a proposition because it would benefit us and operate against the eastern States. I oppose the amendment because, although it might help us, it is in conflict with the general principle which, I think, lies at the root of this whole matter, and which ought to be considered, that the able-bodied male population shall be the defenders of the families separately considered, and in like manner, carrying out the parallel, shall be liable to be called upon as the defenders of the nation, which is the great family.

In regard to obtaining information, I have nothing to say in reply to the gentleman. There are many matters in regard to which I wish we had fuller information. But it is easy to ascertain by the census the number of the population, the proportion of the sexes, and the proportion of the different ages; so that there is no serious difficulty in that respect.

Mr. KERNAN. I move, pro forma, to enable me to say a few words, to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I offered this amendment seriously; and I do not feel at all intimidated from supporting it by the fear that my gallant friend [Mr. SCHENCK] will attempt to enroll the ladies if it be adopted; although I may say to him that we might as well, so far as obtaining soldiers is concerned, enroll the women as a good many very "loyal" men, who, when drafted, only send substitutes. It is, in this respect, a question of money.

What I maintain (and I think that every reflecting man must concur with me) is, that among the States of this Union there should be an assignment of quotas according to the principle which controls in representation. Each should be required to furnish men for the Army in proportion to its population. This is just in principle, and will conduce to fairness in practice. We will then have a fair basis easily ascertained, and not one liable to be made under the influence of partisan feeling or interested motives.

My friend from Illinois tells me that under the call for 500,000 men Illinois, with a population of 1,711,951, was called upon for 52,000, while Massachusetts, with a population of 1,231,000, had a quota of only about 21,000. The population of Illinois is not one third more than Massachusetts, but her quota of men to be furnished for the war is a great deal more than double. Massachusetts, with all of her wealth, although she is prospering during the war, when other States are impoverished by it, is not required, under the present system, to furnish men for the Army in proportion to her wealth or population. Under the last call for 300,000 she was required to furnish but a small quota, while that of Illinois was 32,000.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is wrong.

Mr. KERNAN. Then state what your quota under the last call for 300,000 was. I have tried in vain to get the authentic information.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Under what call?

Mr. KERNAN. The last one for 300,000. Have you ever had a quota of over about 20,000?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I cannot state exactly the number under the last call. Our quotas under the calls for 300,000 men have varied. Under a call for 300,000, in 1862, our quota, as first published, was over 20,000, and after a correction it was 19,080, and this number of men was raised by volunteer enlistments.

Mr. KERNAN. When? Was it under the call for 300,000? What was the quota assigned to Massachusetts under the last call? The papers state it to be less than 17,000. I have not been able to obtain the information from the War Department. I want to know what it is. I will take the figures of my friend from Illinois. Under the last call her quota was 32,000, and that of Massachusetts less than 17,000. Illinois, with a population not one third more than Massachusetts, under the call for 500,000 was assigned a quota of 52,000 men, while Massachusetts was assigned but about 20,000. It has attracted the attention of the whole country. States of great wealth, States having large representation, when the quotas come to be assigned, do not have anything like the quotas of the western and middle States of the same population.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman be good enough to repeat what he said was the quota of Illinois?

Mr. KERNAN. My friend from Illinois states it to have been 52,000 under the call for 500,000.

Mr. ELIOT. What does he state to be the quota of Massachusetts?

Mr. KERNAN. We cannot find out. We cannot learn from the War Department. We understand that it was not above 20,000.

Mr. ELIOT. Does the gentleman want to know what it is?

Mr. KERNAN. I do.

Mr. ELIOT. Under the call of July 18, 1864, it was 21,670.

Mr. KERNAN. That is what I want to get. Illinois had a quota of 52,000 assigned to her, more than double that of Massachusetts, when there is very little difference in the number of the population.

Mr. ELIOT. A large proportion of the population of Massachusetts is composed of women.

Mr. KERNAN. It is a population that claims and has representation; a population which is making money during the war. The present is a system to raise money with which to send men into the field. It is for raising money in the rich States, and compelling the poor States to send their men.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman say how many of the 52,000 men from Illinois were young men who came from Massachusetts?

Mr. KERNAN. I said that the reason why the new States had so large a quota was, that the quota was assigned according to the young men between twenty and forty-five. I say that it should be according to population. There are young men enough in each of the States to fill its quota based upon its population, and each State should contribute them.

I have proposed this amendment in good faith. I believe it is the just mode of requiring men to be furnished by the States, and that it is the way to prevent frauds and favoritism, and will be unjust to no State or its population.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I wish to submit a statement to illustrate the impolicy and injustice of the proposition the gentleman has laid before the House. The amendment proposes entirely to change the basis upon which our Army is to be raised, by letting it rest upon the whole population, including men, women, and children of all ages, without regard to their ability to bear arms. To illustrate that I will read three items from the population report of the census of 1860. In all the eastern States it will be observed that the ratio between the number of males and females preponderates on the side of females; while, as you go westward, the males are in excess. The census shows that Massachusetts, in 1860, had a population of 1,221,464, of whom 629,220 were females, showing an excess of 36,976 females. In California, in the same year, there was a population of 323,177, of which 227,774 were males and only 96,406 females. But I find a still stronger case in the State of Nevada, which was a Territory in 1860. In her population of 6,857, there were 6,137 males and only 720 females; that is, there were nearly ten men to one woman. The proposed basis would make it vastly more difficult for Massachusetts to fill her quota than for California or Nevada. Every man can see at a glance that it would weigh very heavily upon those States having an excess of females, and render it comparatively easy for the new and growing States, to which the arms-bearing population of the eastern States have emigrated, to furnish their quotas.

Mr. GANSON. If that statement is correct, why is there the same relative increase of voters in Massachusetts as in other States?

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it that old men vote as well as young men. But I doubt the correctness of the statement of the gentleman as a matter of fact.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to have the gentleman explain one fact. Under the call for 500,000 men my district was assigned 2,270, and it furnished them all. Under the call of 300,000 men the quota of the same district was 3,209. I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I may say that I am not responsible for the mathematics of the Provost Marshal General's department, nor is the question pertinent to the point now in discussion.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not know but the gentleman could explain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have only to say that this proposition totally changes the basis of our Army by taking the entire population, and it would be a gross injustice and a hardship upon the States from which the arms-bearing population has emigrated.

Mr. SCHENCK. Perhaps some explanation of the difficulty in the district of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] may be found in the fact of the calculations made as to three-years and one-year men. The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his count makes a three-years man and a one-year man count the same; but the rule prevails that the enlistment of three men for one year each counts the same as the enlistment of one man for three years.

Mr. GARFIELD. That might account for part of the difference.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I understand that every time a draft is made for a three-years man it counts three times.

Mr. GARFIELD. A three-years man is equal to three one-year men.

Mr. STEVENS. Then when you kill a three-years man you kill three men.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have only one word more to say, and I wish to say it before I leave this point. The gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] asserts that these States raise their quotas by money, and that therefore the wealth of a State, rather than the men of a State, are to be taken into account. I answer the gentleman that the second section of this bill cuts off entirely the substitute system excepting so far as men may find substitutes in their own townships or wards, and therefore his money argument falls to the ground. Massachusetts will hereafter be obliged now to get her substitutes from her own districts, or from foreign countries.

I hope this radical change in our system will not be made. I move to close debate on the section, and on all amendments thereto.

Mr. KERNAN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I renew it, and ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the motion to close debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to say a word on this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT.]

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state two or three facts in connection with the quota of Massachusetts which may as well be stated now as at any other time. During the whole period of this war there have been called for from Massachusetts 117,624 men. In the early period of the rebellion the government of Massachusetts used every exertion in its power to induce the War Department at Washington to receive more men than were called for from the Commonwealth. The number of men who have been furnished by Massachusetts is 125,437, making a surplus over all calls of 7,813 men.

But, sir, that does not state the whole facts. The number of men credited to Massachusetts up to October, 1863, was 75,608; but, reduced to the standard of three-years men, it was 58,898.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts how many of these men were negroes of the South?

Mr. ELIOT. Colored people from the South?

Mr. GANSON. Yes; and from other States than Massachusetts.

Mr. ELIOT. Massachusetts has furnished 125,437 men. All of the colored men credited to Massachusetts and all foreign recruits credited to her, including about 5,000 men enlisted to her credit in the Veteran Reserve corps and regular Army, fall short of 10,700 men.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he does not know that the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments of Massachusetts colored troops are from Ohio and other western States.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; I know no such thing. I state what the record authorizes me to state.

Mr. NOBLE. Well, I know it.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot be interrupted now. I repeat, if the gentleman will permit me, that there have been, including all foreigners and including all colored persons, and including 5,000 veteran reserves and men in the regular Army, less than 11,000 men enlisted in her regiments, out of between one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and twenty-six thousand, and many of the veteran reserves are citizens of our State. And let me say here that there have not been a thousand men put into the Army from Massachusetts, but very little over nine hundred, who were foreigners brought here for that purpose.

And I will state one more fact. There has not been one man brought from any part of the world whom the government of Massachusetts has had any agency in bringing here. Whatever has been done has been done by individual action. The applications that have been made to Massachusetts from abroad have been invariably refused. The Governor of Massachusetts has had no connection whatever with it. If I had time I could state more particularly than it is necessary to do now the precise manner in which these men have been brought into the country. But the State of Massachusetts has had no connection with it. Without allowing for the reenlistments Massachusetts has sent more men into the service than can be found now within her boundaries between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. She has sent 20,000 more men than are now in the State liable to do military duty.

If the gentlemen desire to ask me any other questions in connection with the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, I am ready to answer.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to state the number of men that Massachusetts has been required to furnish under the recent call.

Mr. ELIOT. When the call was made there was but a very small number of men which the State could be called upon to furnish, because of the surplus that she had before furnished. There were several thousands of surplus. But it so happened, because of the manner in which the men are called for, that there are in Massachusetts two districts where they are deficient some 805 men. But the State as a State stands far ahead of the call.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman inform the House what was the quota assigned to Massachusetts under the recent call?

Mr. ELIOT. Under the call of July, 1864, it was 21,670 men.

Mr. EDEN. What was it under the call of December 19, 1864?

Mr. ELIOT. I do not think I can give that to the gentleman accurately. I have not the data here from which to give it.

Mr. SMITH. I think this is a very important subject. I wish to take up the idea suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and make some inquiries in regard to it. The distribution of the quotas, in the first instance, under the call for 500,000, and then under the last call, seems to be very strange, and one for which I cannot account. I know the idea has prevailed, to some extent among some men, that the State which I have the honor in part to represent bears a twofold relation to this great struggle. I know that she has furnished an army to the rebellion; I know that she has furnished an army to the Union; I know that we have men there who sympathize with the rebellion on the one side, and men whose sympathies are all with the Union on the other side. I know that under every call which has been made upon the State of Kentucky by the Government for troops to fill up the ranks of the Union Army, my State has uniformly come forward and furnished whatever quota was demanded of her. Under the call for 500,000 men Kentucky was called upon to furnish twenty-odd thousand men. I do not know what were the circumstances under which that quota was filled in other sections of the State, but I do know that in my own district our people came forward, and outside of the draft, regardless of the draft, with their own means and by their own exertions, with a determined patriotism and purpose to assist the Government in putting down this rebellion, they filled up the quota they were then called upon to fill. In my own county, the county of Kenton, we were called upon for 248 men under the call for 500,000 men. Under the call for 300,000 men we were called upon to furnish 315 men.

Now, I cannot for my life understand how that can be explained. I would like to have some member of the Military Committee, or some gentleman who understands the rules that apply to the apportionment of the draft, who has access to the Provost Marshal General, or who can obtain a private conversation with the Secretary of War, or with those who distribute the draft throughout the country, to explain to the House how this is. I have felt a strong interest in this matter. I have felt a desire that my own people should be represented in the Army; that every man who is called upon to go should go, in order that the ranks of our armies should be filled. I have been in the provost marshal's office from day to day, and from week to week; I have gone over the county urging our people to come forward and fill up our quota by volunteering; and I know, by personal observation, that under the call for 500,000 men, of the hundreds who came in and claimed exemption, according to rules laid down by the board, not more than three or four men out of every twenty were deemed fit for military duty, according to the rules prescribed by the War Department. Every man within the ages prescribed by the law had been enrolled. Every man who was drafted was notified to come up to the office of the provost marshal and present himself for examination, to see whether he was physically and mentally qualified to go into the Army, and I say that upon that examination, throughout my whole district, and I believe within the State of Kentucky, fifteen out of twenty were found to be disqualified.

Now, if that was found to be so upon a quota of 258 men under the call for 500,000, what are we to do under the call for 300,000 men, when they demand of us 315 men? You may go into my district and you will find there hundreds and thousands of people moving about attending to their business, upon their farms, in their stores, offices, &c., and out of that number you have called, and you call again for men until you have taken almost every man who is able to bear arms in defense of his country.

Now, men seem to forget that we in the State of Kentucky occupy a peculiar position. Men upon this floor seem to forget that we stand upon the border; that the State of Kentucky is the great barrier between the southern confederacy and the North. Men seem to forget that the State of Kentucky, lying upon the Ohio river, has a border of seven hundred miles between the southern confederacy and the North. Men of Ohio, men of Indiana, men of Illinois, men of States further east, men of the New England States, all seem to forget that the loyalty of Kentucky has saved them from depredation, from waste, from war, bloodshed, and ruin. They seem to ignore in all their legislation the loyalty of the people who have stood as a mighty bulwark between the wrong and the right.

Mr. Speaker, however much it may be to me a source of keen regret that hundreds and thousands of our people have gone into rebellion, have fought against this Government, have trampled beneath their feet the glorious emblem of our liberties, there is, notwithstanding all that, a feeling that wells up in the bosom of every loyal man in that State, and makes him feel thankful to God that we have had seventy thousand gallant and noble men in the field who have spilt their blood on many a battle-field, from Bull Run to Atlanta, and from Atlanta to Charleston and Wilmington. They have stood side by side with Illinoisans, Indians, Ohioans, New Englanders, New Yorkers, everywhere giving testimony of their bravery and their patriotism. Yet there is, I am sorry to say, a disposition on the part of some Representatives here to sneer at and degrade the proud old Commonwealth that I have the honor in part to represent. Let men say what they please, while I love my country I love also my State, and he who is an enemy of my State is my enemy, politically and personally.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. I was asked just now how many colored troops have been credited to Massachusetts. I desire to say that the colored troops credited to Massachusetts during this war, including the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth infantry, the fifth cavalry and their recruits, amount, all told, at home and abroad, to 4,371.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment of my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] by inserting after the word "State" in the next to the last line, the words "and congressional district."

I make this motion for the purpose of being able to say a few words in support of the amendment presented by my colleague, which, in my judgment, is eminently sound and proper. It is true that I have not favored this system of conscription; and one reason why I have not favored it is because it operates, and necessarily and unavoidably must operate, unequally. As a measure for supplying our armies with reliable men by direct draft, it has proved, as many of us believed it would, a practical failure; as a measure of taxation it is notoriously and undeniably unjust, unequal, and oppressive; and I verily believe that if the system of volunteering had been continued we would have been much more successful in filling our armies, and would have secured a much better class of men, at a greatly reduced expense and a more equal distribution of the inevitable burdens of the war.

It is well known, as was stated by my colleague, that under the recent calls it has been simply a question of money and not at all a question of men, except so far as the number called for affected the amount of money to be raised. And when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Military Committee, undertakes to laugh down here a proposition which, upon the idea assumed by my colleague that conscription simply means taxation in another form, is clear to the common sense of every intelligent man as any proposition can be, I think that gentleman would much better sustain respect for himself and the dignity of this House if he would attempt to answer it by some legitimate argument. Why, sir, if the gentleman can and will tell us it was not money that filled the quotas on these last calls, then there might be some propriety in his attempt to laugh at my colleague when he proposes that they shall be filled hereafter somewhat in proportion to representation and legitimate taxation, instead of compelling poor men, where there happens to be many of them in localities of little wealth, to pay much more than is demanded of rich men in localities where not so many are liable to the draft.

The gentleman from Massachusetts complains that their young men have gone off to the West. Mr. ELIOT. No, sir, I do not complain of it at all.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. The gentleman complained that they of Massachusetts are subjected to hardships on that account. Now, sir, I am not one of those who desire to cast any slings at Massachusetts. It is true enough that Massachusetts has been brought up here in the course of argument oftentimes, by way of illustration, without any ill-feeling toward that State or the gentlemen who represent it here. One reason, doubtless, why Massachusetts has been often alluded to in that way is, that she is a State exercising perhaps as great an influence in the councils of the nation, in this momentous crisis of our country, as any other. She is represented in both Houses of Congress entirely by men who sympathize with the Administration in their political views; and in consequence of her great wealth, in consequence of the great power of her statesmen, and undivided front of representation, she does exercise an influence in the councils of the nation which might well cause the other States to look on at least with apprehension. And since it is undeniable that the burdens she bears, particularly in reference to the draft, are in no manner commensurate with her position, influence, and continually increasing wealth, therefore it is not strange that gentlemen should refer to Massachusetts as a wonderfully favored portion of the country.

If the men of Massachusetts go to the West, who are they that go? Are they the men of wealth and capital? Are they the men who from over-filled coffers can afford to buy up substitutes to represent them in the Army? The poor young men who go to the West to seek their fortunes are of course liable to military duty, and thus Massachusetts is relieved from the draft to that extent. So long as the volunteer system was in vogue the young men of the country, without regard to location, sprang forward to enter as a matter of patriotism into the service of the country. When this system of draft was established the spirit which prompted volunteering was substantially extinguished, and then it became a question of dollars and cents. While the volunteering system was continued, the necessity of paying proper respect to the popular will in order to fill our armies operated as a check upon the unwise and visionary schemes of extreme men, and no doubt that was the prompting reason why they desired to abandon volunteering and resort to conscription.

I know it was said that the volunteering was also unequal, as the more patriotic sections furnished an undue proportion of men. That difficulty, however, could have been obviated by demanding of each State its due proportion in accordance with certain suggestions I had the honor to urge upon the consideration of this House while the first conscription bill was under discussion. There is no justice and no reason why a poor State, which has a great many poor men, should be called upon to pay large sums of money, or compel her citizens to abandon their families to the tender mercies of common charity, or even more degrading pauperism, while a rich State, with men of overgrown fortunes, can skulk behind the women and children, and by claiming inferiority of numbers of such as are liable to draft, throw the burden upon the poor men of the poor States.

I withdraw my amendment, and yield the floor, according to agreement, to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK moved that debate be closed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 91, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Harding, Herrick, Hutchins, Kabisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Putney, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Townsend, Voorhees, Clifton A. White, Windfall, and Fernando Wood—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lutzar, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pike, Pomerooy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—91.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Baxter, Freeman Clarke, Cravens, Cresswell, Dawes, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Knox, Le Blond, McDowell, Melndoe, Amos Myers, Nelson, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Sweat, Upson, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Joseph W. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the eighth section, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person, either by himself or in partnership or connection with others, to engage in the business of procuring recruits or substitutes, as an agent, substitute broker, or otherwise, for money or profit, without having first obtained from the Secretary of War authority in writing; and such authority shall in no case be granted except upon personal application of the party seeking to be so authorized, and on his first filing, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, proof of his loyalty and good character, and that he is a citizen of the United States, and on his giving bond to the United States, with sufficient and approved security in the sum of $50,000, that he will faithfully observe and obey all laws and regulations in force, or that may be in force or established hereafter, governing the obtaining of recruits or substitutes; but the provisions of this section shall not apply to any person who may engage as agent or member of a committee or association in obtaining recruits or substitutes within the sub-district in which he himself resides, and to aid in filling the quota of said sub-district.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the word "personal" before the word "application." It requires that the man shall apply in person. He may be well recommended, and I do not see any reason for requiring that he shall be personally present.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was put in with a design. Its object was to throw as many obstacles as possible in the way of substitute brokers.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would wipe them all out.

Mr. SCHENCK. They are recognized as an existing institution, and they are taxed in the tax bill. But I thought it well enough that they should come here and show what manner of men they are.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That would sometimes be inconvenient; and I think the gentleman, upon consideration, will allow my amendment to come in.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no power to accept this amendment, as this bill is a report from a committee.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I rely upon the House to adopt it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by inserting the following, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That persons who have been, or may hereafter be drafted, under the provisions of the several acts to which this is an amendment, for a term of one year, and who have actually furnished or may actually furnish accepted substitutes not liable to draft, for a term of three years, shall be exempt from military duty during the term for which such substitutes shall not be liable to draft, not exceeding the time for which such substitute shall have been mustered into the service, anything in the fifth section of the act of February 24, 1864, to the contrary notwithstanding.

I desire to explain briefly the effect and object of this amendment. Under the fourth section of the act of last winter, any person could put in a substitute and get a certificate of exemption for the time the substitute was mustered into the service. Gentlemen were drafted for one year under the call, and without scanning the provisions of the law closely, very many men put in substitutes for three years. But a critical examination of the law revealed the fact that the provost marshal could not give them certificates of exemption beyond the term for which they were drafted. Therefore, having put in substitutes to a great extent for three years, they could not get certificates of exemption for more than one year. This amendment cures that evil for the past and the future.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;

An act (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor;

An act (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly, in Massachusetts; and

An act (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 472) for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska; and

An act (S. No. 465) to create the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General.

ENROLLMENT ACT—AGAIN.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] by striking out the word "substitutes" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "certificates."

Mr. BLAINE. That amendment would open all the evils of paper credits. My amendment deals with actual men.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That is not my intention.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order. Is not this a motion to strike out what we have already inserted?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SMITH. I would inquire how, under his amendment, the gentleman would be able to prevent frauds.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Certificates of substitutions are received under authority of law. A man may have been drafted, may have furnished a substitute, and lived up to the spirit and letter of the law; and I do not wish this Congress to be behind the spirit and letter of the law.

Mr. SMITH. I would inquire of the gentleman whether he remembers the frauds which have been perpetrated under these certificates.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have nothing to do with frauds. Perhaps they have been concocted in Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] In regard to this matter of paper credits, I differ from the opinions of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] as I understand them. I hold that where the party himself has had nothing to do with the frauds he is not to be held responsible. If I understand the system under which these fraudulent certificates were issued, it is this: Government officers themselves have issued them, and parties have bought them. I understand that parties have them to sell, under the regulations and authority of the Department. I do not see why the purchaser of one of these certificates, even if it have been obtained by fraud, shall be ousted of his rights.

Mr. SMITH. I ask whether the rule is not this, that when a drafted man appears at the provost marshal's and offers a substitute, and when that substitute is examined and received, but deserts before being mustered in, the drafted man or the district shall be held responsible?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Neither of them.

Mr. SMITH. Then I should like to know what good the evidence of the provost marshal's office does that the principal has furnished a substitute and that the substitute has been examined and accepted. You give a paper man where the Government should have a real man.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. That is not the case I pointed to. I understand the practice to have been to permit men to put in substitutes and to give them certificates of the fact, which certificates they had a right to transfer to people in any section of the country. I heard a substitute broker say, the other day, that he had six certificates for substitutes under a former call, which he would sell at $500 each. I understand that that has been the practice under the authority and regulations of the War Department.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that it has been the practice for brokers to obtain certificates and sell them to any persons?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I understand so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, that is a form of fraud and rascality that I have not heard of before. Some new system of fraud turns up with these fellows every day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Certificates under a former draft can be had, I understand, at $500 apiece.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certificates are given as personal to the individual drafted and to nobody else. To sell them to anybody else would be a fraud all around.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania where that substitute broker resides and does business.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. In this city.

Mr. SMITH. What is his name?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. If you want frauds connected with this thing, you may go to the provost marshal's office and discover any quantity of them. If you want frauds I will show you worse things than that. But, sir, I rose for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] whether the proposition that he now offers will not interfere with the proposition offered by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. BLAINE. It will not; and the gentleman himself will tell you so.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I understood that proposition to provide that parties putting in substitutes shall not be responsible for them.

Mr. BLAINE. This in no way interferes with it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. There is not the least objection to the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has himself examined it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to close all debate on the section and on the amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken first on Mr. RANDALL's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. BLAINE's amendment, and it was adopted.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the ninth section, as follows:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who, for pay or profit, shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person, or convict, or person under indictment for a felony, or who is held to bail to answer for a felony, or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such, or who shall defraud, or illegally deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty to which he may be entitled, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, be fined not exceeding $1,000, nor less than $200, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, and not less than three months, or both, in the discretion of the court aforesaid.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "service" the words "or any minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, without the consent, express or implied, of his parents or guardians, or any minor under the age of sixteen years."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the clause which now reads "knowing him to be such," by inserting after the words "knowing him," the words "in either of the cases before mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. For the purpose of making some inquiries, I move to strike out the whole of section nine. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] whether this section is intended to deprive or prevent the substitute broker from taking any part of the local bounty as a fee for his services; to prevent him from receiving any compensation whatever for his services?

Mr. SCHENCK. He can make what outside bargain he pleases. But he is not to finger the bounty; that is to be paid directly to the party himself. This section is precisely like a section which has already been passed by the Senate in their bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would not care particularly about the language of the section if I was satisfied it would be properly construed by the small courts-martial. But I confess that, so far as my observation has gone, I have not a great deal of confidence in them. It seems to me that the language of the section as it now stands will be liable to very great abuse. It reads:

That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who for pay or profit shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person or convict, or person under indictment for a felony, or who is held to bail to answer for a felony, or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such, or who shall defraud, or illegally deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty to which he may be entitled, shall, upon conviction, &c.

The question will arise, what is illegally depriving a party of any portion of the bounty to which he is entitled? The chairman of the Military Committee says that the taking any portion of it whatsoever is illegally depriving the person enlisted of that bounty, and will subject the person taking it to the penalties of this section. That would at once be an improper construction to start with.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see any of the difficulties of which the gentleman speaks. This section applies only to cases where they defraud or illegally deprive the substitute of his bounty. That will affect no legitimate contract made with him for the disposal of any portion of his bounty. It only prevents the broker from appropriating the bounty to his own use, without having any legitimate contract with the substitute. The truth is that in very many cases the substitute broker gets all, or nearly all, the bounty.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am aware of that.

Mr. SCHENCK. And the recruit or substitute gets very little of it. I think the words used are safe enough.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my motion to strike out the section.

The tenth section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That any officer who shall muster into the military or naval service of the United States any deserter from said service, or insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, knowing him to be such, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial, be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend this section by inserting before the words "court-martial," the words "civil court or."

Mr. SCHENCK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that this section applies only to officers in the military service. It does not apply to the trial of civilians at all. Substitute brokers and others, not in the military service, are to be tried, under the provisions of the preceding section, before civil courts. But if any officer of the Army commits the offense described in this section, he is to be tried by court-martial.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I move to insert after the words "in a condition of intoxication" the same words inserted in the preceding section on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS], "or any minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years without the consent, express or implied, of his parents or guardians, or any minor under the age of sixteen years."

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will strike out the words "express or implied." Let it be the actual consent of parents or guardians.

Mr. THAYER. I accept the modification.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to say that in preparing the amendment I offered to the preceding section I adhered to the language used in the existing law upon that subject. If that language is objectionable, it is the fault of the existing law. I ask unanimous consent to modify that amendment by striking out the words "express or implied."

No objection being made, the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of New York, to section nine, was modified accordingly.

Mr. PRICE. I move to insert the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That any person, who shall have been drafted, who shall offer as a substitute any deserter or insane person, knowing him to be such, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, nor less than $300, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, nor less than six months, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have a section on that subject which has been prepared with a great deal of care, which I will offer as a substitute for the section proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] It is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in every case where a substitute is furnished to take the place of an enrolled or drafted man, and it is shown, by evidence that shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of War, that such substitute, at the time of his enlistment, was known to the party furnishing him to be non compos mentis, or in a condition of intoxication, or under conviction or indictment for any offense of the grade of felony at the common law, or to have been guilty of a previous act of desertion, unsatisfied by pardon or punishment, or, by reason of any existing infirmity or ailment, physically incapable of performing the ordinary duties of a soldier in active service in the ranks, it shall be the duty of the Provost Marshal General, on advice of the fact, to report the same to the provost marshal of the proper district; and if such person so enlisted and incapable shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for any person liable to draft and not actually drafted, the name of the person so liable, who furnished such substitute, shall be again placed on the list, and he shall be subject to draft thereafter as though no such substitute had been furnished by him; and if such substitute, since the passage of this act, aforesaid, shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person actually drafted, then it shall be the duty of the Provost Marshal General to direct the provost marshal of the proper district immediately to notify the person who furnished such substitute that he is held to service in the place of such substitute, and he shall stand in the same relation, and be subject to the same liability, as before the furnishing of such substitute.

Mr. PRICE. I accept that amendment as a substitute for mine.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill as originally reported, provided, as will be recollected, for holding principals liable for their substitutes. That provision seemed so objectionable to a majority of this House that it was voted down. What is now proposed, however, proceeds upon a different principle, takes another element into the calculation. The section which I now offer proposes to provide that if a substitute should prove to be insane, or in a condition of intoxication at the time when he is put in, or if he be a convict, or a person physically disqualified for the service, and if it be shown by proof satisfactory to the head of the Department (for there must be somebody to judge of this matter) that the principal knowingly practiced this imposition upon the Government, then the principal shall be held liable, though not in other cases. If the principal has only been enrolled he is only returned for the enrollment; if the principal has been not only enrolled but drafted, then he is held as a drafted man; but in neither case does any liability attach to the principal except upon proof of this fraud, this imposition, practiced upon the officers of the Government.

Mr. SMITHERS. The gentleman from Ohio in his remarks has not referred to the fact that the substitute might prove to have been a deserter. Is that included in the amendment?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is included. The amendment provides that the principal shall also be liable if at the time of putting in the substitute he knows him to have been guilty of a previous act of desertion not satisfied by pardon or punishment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] offered yesterday an amendment, which, to my surprise, was adopted by this House, holding the Government concluded on all occasions where a substitute is received and mustered in. The gentleman claimed that such a provision is proper because the enrolling board and the surgeon who makes the examination represent the Government, and the substitute being accepted by their sanction, with their approval, they acting as agents of the Government, the Government ought to stand entirely concluded and cut off from any further objection subsequently. Now, the obvious answer to that is that these enrolling officers are but human and are liable to be imposed upon. There is no doubt fraud enough, and too much by a great deal, among those who represent the Government; the agents of the Government are often parties to the frauds committed upon it. This does not touch such cases. But where the party furnishing the substitute practices an imposition upon the Government by furnishing a substitute knowing him to be disqualified, it is very hard to insist that the Government shall be held responsible, and that the mustering in shall not be set aside on account of the fraud.

It is a fact which has come to the knowledge of every one who has investigated this subject, as have the Committee on Military Affairs, that there are scores of cases where persons put in as substitutes have been subject to epileptic fits, totally disqualified for the service, and have been sent to the hospitals and discharged within a few weeks after entering the service. Yet at the time when they were mustered in there was no appearance of any such disqualification. As I am not a member of the medical profession it is not for me to say how a surgeon could be thus imposed upon; but I presume, from facts which have come to my knowledge, that even a well-meaning and skillful surgeon may be imposed upon in the case of an epileptic. However that may be, epileptics have been received in many cases; their unfitness for the service has been afterward discovered, although they had passed an examination; and this in cases where the proof was clear and distinct that the party who produced the substitute had known for years that the substitute was thus epileptic. Lunatics have been received during a lucid interval, and afterward, falling into their paroxysms, have necessarily been discharged.

Now, without going further into particulars, the section which I propose provides for all cases of this kind, where fraud is practiced upon the officers representing the Government. It proposes that the Government shall not, at least in these cases, be held liable, but that the penalty for this willful imposition practiced upon the Government shall be that the enrolled or the drafted man, as the case may be, shall take his place upon the rolls or in the draft, in the same manner as if he had not furnished a substitute.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will admit the insanity when the fanaticism is admitted by the gentlemen themselves. But I do not care to find myself in such strange company. There is a proviso here which gives the right of judgment to the provost marshal as to whether a man is crazy or not.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB reported that the Committee on Enrolled Bills had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, this is reenacting what we struck out yesterday. It is the same in substance. The Government of the United States appoints the board of enrollment. It is composed of one military officer, one surgeon, and one intelligent citizen. Their duty is to examine all who are offered as substitutes, as well as others. They go into an examination and render a judgment, and on that judgment the substitute is accepted and the principal pays his money. After the substitute has been examined and accepted, we have decided that that shall be the end of the liability of the principal. I think that we decided rightly.

The gentleman wants a new trial. He proposes that litigation shall never end; that a man who has furnished a substitute and has paid his money, after a thorough examination, shall be again liable. There is to be no repose. They are to go before a tribunal thousands of miles away. In the case of a substitute put in at St. Louis or Portland, the tribunal to reverse it is to sit here in Washington; and the principal is required to come here, after doing all that the law required, to answer a charge of having fraudulently put in a substitute.

It seems to me that we are making this bill more odious, if possible, than it was originally. It is vexatious, perplexing, oppressive to the people, and I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. I should be sorry to be compelled to vote against the bill, for it contains some good provisions in regard to substitute brokers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I agree to-day with my friend from Ohio, and yesterday I differed with him; and I differ with my colleague to-day although I agreed with him yesterday. I think there is no analogy between the two sections. The case proposed yesterday was that the principal was held responsible where he was without default; in other words, that the soldier was under the charge of the officers of the Government, who were armed with ample power to prevent him from deserting, and bound to hold him in custody. I agreed with my friend from Pennsylvania that it would be at violence with the first principles of natural justice to hold the principal responsible when he had incurred no default whatever, and when the whole default was on the part of the Government itself. What is this case? The amendment proposes, as I understand, to cover those cases where a court of equity would interfere.

Mr. STEVENS. Will my friend allow me to ask him whether there could not be some mode of trial adopted? Is it to be the mere ipse dixit of the Secretary of War?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I answer the gentleman in this way: the fact of the Secretary of War being an officer of the Government does not disqualify him as a judge presiding in cases of this sort. To make them efficient they must necessarily be of a summary character. I am sure that my friend will recognize the necessity for jurisdiction of that kind in many civil cases. In controversies in our courts, where the Government is one party and an individual another, the jurisdiction must necessarily be summary. There may be errors in the administration of justice in all courts, sometimes hardships, and sometimes injustice. But I suggest, again, that the only question here is whether a party who has made a contract with the Government upon fraudulent representations shall be allowed to enjoy the advantages of that contract when no consideration has passed from him? And I ask my friend from Pennsylvania

[Mr. THAYER] whether there is a court of equity in the United States that would not adjudge a contract of that description void under the circumstances stated? Fraud vitiates all contracts. That is a well-settled principle and rule of law; and that is all this amendment proposes.

Mr. STEVENS withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I renew the amendment. There is considerable force in the suggestion of my colleague from western Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] but then the difficulty, it strikes me, is this: the party who is to decide upon the facts is one of the parties interested in the question to be decided, and he is to decide it after the military fashion, in a very summary manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any difference between this case and that of a judge sitting upon the bench in any court of the United States on a case in which the United States is a party?

Mr. THAYER. That case, I will say to the gentleman, is by no means analogous to the one which will arise under this amendment. It will be left to some military officer of the Government, and that officer, in his natural desire to prevent any dishonest evasion of the law, may feel called upon to put a very rigid construction upon the conduct of the person who put in the substitute. He may set up a rule which will subject the people of this country to very great inconvenience or oppression. He may, as has already been said, compel parties to travel hundreds of miles to this capital to prove their innocence of that which is laid to their charge.

Now, sir, I think the whole error involved in this proposition, and in the proposition of yesterday to change the law upon this subject, consists in supposing that after the Government has accepted a substitute, there remains the slightest shred of the relationship of principal and agent between the man who has furnished the substitute and the substitute himself. There is, after the examination and acceptance of the substitute, no such relationship at all. The substitute is not the agent of the man who puts him in. He is his substitute; that is, (as the word implies,) he stands in his place. The party drawn has fulfilled the requisition of the law; he has satisfied all its demands. There is, then, no relationship of principal and agent between these men.

Mr. A. MYERS. Does my colleague believe that a lunatic owes military service to the country?

Mr. THAYER. It is hardly necessary to answer that question.

Mr. A. MYERS. Then if a man puts a lunatic into the service, has he who furnished such a substitute given anything to the Government?

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman could not have listened to my remarks, or he would have understood that I do not controvert the general proposition that a man who willfully and fraudulently imposes on the Government a man unfit for military duty should be punished for it. That is not the question before the House.

Mr. DRIGGS. That is just this proposition.

Mr. THAYER. No, sir. I beg pardon. The proposition contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is that the Government shall decide upon the guilty knowledge of the citizen who furnished the substitute, not according to the forms of law provided for the punishment of criminal offenses, but in a summary and military manner. That is an authority which I will not by any vote of mine give to the military officers of the Government.

I am asked by the gentleman from Delaware near me [Mr. SMITHERS] who I propose shall decide this question. I do not propose that there shall be any one to decide it at all, because I am opposed to the incorporation of such a provision in this bill. I believe it to be unwise and unnecessary. I believe that the only proper foundation upon which the law in regard to substitutes can rest is that upon which it now stands; that is, when a man who is liable to military duty has furnished his substitute, and when the agent of the Government expressly employed and paid to examine that substitute, in order to see that his qualifications come up to the requisitions of the law, has decided upon his competency, it is unwise and impolitic to go back of that transaction, and to give to an officer of the Government the power to decide in a summary manner, and without the usual forms of trial which shield the citizen from arbitrary authority, the question whether the drafted man knew the defects of the substitute furnished. I think it would be very unwise to make any such alteration in the enrollment law as that which is now proposed. I think it would be most distasteful to the people of this country, and perhaps very unjust and oppressive in its operations. I think that, so far from its being an improvement upon the law, it will bring reproach upon it. I therefore hope the House will vote it down as emphatically as they yesterday voted down the original proposition to make the citizen responsible for the conduct of the substitute after he is mustered into the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I confess to a great deal of surprise at the vehement manner—and I do not put the phrase too strong—of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. THAYER. If my manner is not personally offensive to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I do not know that it is a proper subject of public comment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that I have said anything offensive in characterizing his manner as vehement.

Mr. THAYER. It is personally offensive.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not at all personally offensive, nor was I saying anything personally offensive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I was about to remark, what I shall not be prevented from remarking, when interrupted, that I was surprised at the vehement manner in which a proposition of this kind is opposed by a gentleman whom I know to be rated, and justly, I presume, as a good equity lawyer. And yet, with an earnestness which does seem to me very remarkable, he takes the position that no frauds practiced on the agents of the Government can be punished by the Government, but that the Government must submit to the consequences. I was surprised, in the first place, that a good lawyer should maintain a position of that kind. I was further surprised that he should be so earnest in that remarkable doctrine as his vehemence of manner showed him to be. Take his argument in its length and breadth, and it is nothing but this—that, so far as the Government is concerned, it shall not be relieved, even as against fraud, but shall be concluded by the acceptance, on the part of its agents, of any substitute, no matter who or what he may be; no matter how totally unfit for the service; no matter how entirely concealed that unfitness was, so that the examining officers could not detect it and thus prevent his being accepted.

Now this, permit me to say to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] is a very different proposition from the one rejected yesterday. I am so well satisfied of the difficulties that arise out of this matter of substitutes and bounties that I was disposed to hold principals liable for their substitutes. The House, however, voted down that proposition. But the proposition now presented in the form of an amendment to take the place of a new section, is totally different from that, so far as the principle lying at the bottom of it is concerned. It proposes to limit the liability of principals to those cases, and those cases only, where the principal has been a party to a fraud practiced on the Government, and where he is shown to have been so. If these two ideas are the same, then I cannot comprehend distinctions.

Mr. STEVENS. I objected particularly because of the tribunal, thousands of miles away. A party might as well put in a new substitute as have to come here to make a defense. It is the same as making the word of the officer final and conclusive on the principal.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am well aware that the gentleman assigned that as another objection; but at the commencement of his remarks he was particular to tell the House that this was precisely the same proposition that was voted down yesterday; and to that I am now replying. His colleague [Mr. THAYER] also said that this was an equivalent proposition to that which had not only been voted down, but which, to use his own words, had been emphatically voted down. What I say is that the two propositions are totally different; and members of the House will judge between us on that point when they come to vote.

Now, as to the tribunal. It is necessary that somebody should decide these cases. It is necessary, in getting men for your Army, that you shall act in a somewhat summary manner. Does the gentleman propose to organize a court in every district whenever a question of this case may arise? Does he propose that the officers of the Government shall go before some neighboring justice of the peace, before some judge of probate, before some court of common pleas, or to have a military court established? The whole thing is impossible. Somebody must determine whether the proof of fraud is sufficient or not. I was not willing to take the decision of the Provost Marshal General upon that subject. I proposed that that proof should be submitted to, and amount to what should be satisfactory to the mind and judgment of, the head of the Military Department. I know he is an officer of the Government; so are the judges of your Supreme Court. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] might as well say that you cannot make, quoad hoc, a judge to decide upon this or any other matter out of the Secretary of War, or any one else, and thus extend the argument and claim that you cannot make a judge to try any case where the Government or any of its interests is in question. There must be a tribunal to administer this law, and it must be made up of some one or more persons selected from among the citizens of the United States, either by devolving the duty upon some official personage already existing, and the incumbent of an office under the law, or else by selecting some private citizen and making him the judge for the occasion. I have here selected a high official and given him the jurisdiction in the matter, because the jurisdiction must be seated somewhere, and the decision must be necessarily somewhat summary.

I am perfectly well aware of the difficulty under which the Committee on Military Affairs and others labor, who wish a vigorous law, sufficient to sustain our armies in the field, and help the Government to put down the rebellion by having armies in the field. We labor under the difficulty of having an almost united front presented to us on the other side, and having some gentlemen on this side so difficult to be satisfied, that, by voting with the opposition to the Army, the opposition to the Administration, the opposition to the Government, at least, in its efforts to put down this rebellion, a majority is very often found against that very large proportion of the friends of the Government on this side who would seek to make efficient laws for these purposes. That being the case, all legislation upon such subjects seems to be made up by the few on this side and the mass upon the other side, who—the most of them, I do not say it of all—will vote against any bill whatsoever, after the few gentlemen on this side have helped them frame and construct it; who do not intend to vote for any bill for any draft, but who are ready enough to unite with some on this side to put it in such a condition that it will be ineffective after it is passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman himself is combining with them to make a hateful bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a matter of judgment, upon which I will leave the House to determine.

Mr. SMITHERS. I move that debate be now closed upon this section and pending amendments.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope that will not be done. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has cast aspersions upon this side of the House, which ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] will withdraw that motion.

Mr. SMITHERS. I think it is better to press the motion, because I see that there is some personal feeling beginning to be manifested.

The question was taken upon the question to close debate upon the pending sections and amendments; and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 50.

So the motion to close debate was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to amend the original section.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 71.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, there being an amendment and an amendment to the amendment already pending.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. THAYER to the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the entire section. I will say that I have listened long enough to the lecturing of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I want to say to him that he cannot look me in the face and say I am not a loyal citizen.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order to narrow down this controversy to its proper limits, I say that I used no such language at all. I said that the majority on that side of the House was opposed to any draft, and would vote against any bill that provided for a draft.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has cast a reflection upon the Democratic side of this House, of which I am a part and parcel. Gentlemen may say the Democratic party is obsolete, but I have an abiding confidence that it will yet show vigor and vitality enough to save the country and preserve the Government. And let me say to the gentleman that he has no right either here or elsewhere to call the motives of gentlemen in question. Now, I have perfect confidence in the courage of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I have seen evidences of it upon record. If the gentleman continues as he has begun here, he will find that there is a resistant element of which he does not conceive. I would recommend to the gentleman if he wants to fight shadows to go promptly to the front and fight the southern confederacy, for that is the only shadow left. [Laughter.] But that is where he has not been, I believe.

A MEMBER. Oh! yes, at Vienna. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Gentlemen may laugh; but it seems to me there is more truth than poetry in what I have said. However, as a loyal citizen, I submit promptly to the requirements of the Military Committee, not one of whose members has ever been in the ranks, [laughter,] and I do not suppose ever will be.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to close all debate on this section and pending amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object to debate being closed. We are at a stage of the bill where I desire to offer an additional section. Let us take a vote on the amendments and dispose of them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Cannot the gentleman offer that afterward to the next section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that he can.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] withdraw his motion for a few moments?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not see the use of this continued wrangling. However, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] desires to make a personal explanation I will withdraw the motion if he will renew it when he has concluded.

Mr. THAYER. I will do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I ought to regret, I suppose, that I cannot satisfy the expectations or nice discriminations of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] with regard to the position which I assumed when I addressed this House in opposition to his amendment either in respect to my matter or my manner. Perhaps as regards the latter I shall improve after I have had a longer opportunity to study the model which he proposes for my imitation.

But, sir, I do not choose to rest under the shadow of the gentleman's misrepresentation of my argument. That is a matter about which I desire to be understood.

Now, sir, the gentleman, by his remarks—than which nothing could be more sophistical—would leave me in the position of having gravely presented to this House the argument that a man who has deliberately imposed upon the Government by a fraud shall be screened from punishment. I have made no such argument. What I said upon that subject was what I now repeat, that while I might agree with the gentleman from Ohio and with the advocates of the amendment before the House, that it would be proper to inflict some punishment upon a man who willfully misrepresents to the Government the qualifications of a substitute, and thus commits a willful fraud upon the Government, I do not believe in either the wisdom or the policy of enacting that wherever a substitute may prove to be disqualified, either physically, morally, or intellectually, it shall be within the power of an officer of the Government, upon his mere ex parte decision of the question, to send into the ranks the man who was originally drawn, and who furnished the substitute.

Now, sir, if there be any man whose intellectual perception is so obtuse that he has not been able to discriminate between the proposition which the gentleman from Ohio imputed to me and the argument which I really placed before the House, I will not take up the time of this House in endeavoring to make it clearer to his comprehension.

My objection to the measure proposed by the gentleman from Ohio was, not that you might not punish in some proper manner, and by some appropriate tribunal, a fraud upon the Government, but that the proposed amendment surrendered the decision of the fact to an improper tribunal, and that it would compel the accused party to travel hundreds of miles to take his trial, and then consign him to be tried by a military tribunal which has already convicted him. Now, sir, I am opposed to that, because I believe that its adoption would weaken the measure which the gentleman from Ohio has in charge. Mr. Speaker, when a man has two strong legs, you do not add to his powers of locomotion by giving him a wooden one in addition. You do not strengthen any good measure by adding to it unjust and odious features. You do not strengthen the enrollment law by incorporating in it provisions which, while they are of no benefit in themselves, are oppressive in their operation and odious to the public sentiment of this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask a question of my colleague. He now seems to have abandoned his original position, and, along with my other colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] surrendered his objection to the principle involved. He admits, I think, that there is an evil here that ought to be corrected, and that a contract of this sort, fraudulent in its nature, ought to be declared void. Will he now be good enough, for the benefit of this Congress and the country, to name the appropriate tribunal?

Mr. STEVENS. I have taken no different position from what I took before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the gentleman to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I said that when the matter had been once tried and decided, that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. THAYER. I will answer the question of my colleague.

I have not abandoned in the slightest degree the position which I originally took. On the contrary, I have endeavored to enforce the views which I originally presented to the House. I have not abandoned in any manner the position for which I originally contended. Therefore, the gentleman will not, of course, expect me to assist him in carrying this measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understand my colleague correctly, he is now prepared to admit that this is a case in which the Government ought to be relieved. I ask him, therefore, to propose the means of relief, to name what he considers the proper tribunal to pass upon this question.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman, or any member of the Military Committee, will propose an adequate punishment for the willful and fraudulent putting in of a disqualified substitute, and will provide that the accused shall be tried by the ordinary tribunals of the country, I would have no objection to voting for such a measure. But that is a proposition quite different from that which the gentleman and his associates are attempting to induce this House to adopt.

Mr. STEVENS. There is provision in another section for the punishment of frauds of this kind.

Mr. ODELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my colleague on the Committee on Military Affairs, and I give notice that I will yield no further.

Mr. ODELL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has stated that this is a distinct proposition from that which the House has voted down already; and I understand him to take exception to the statements of both gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS and Mr. THAYER] contravening his declaration that it was a new and distinct proposition. Now, while it is true that the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs before the House is not so wide in its scope nor so general in its provisions as the one voted down yesterday, yet I believe that the principle upon which the House voted yesterday is contravened in this very proposition before us. It shifts the responsibility which belongs to the Government to the man who is liable to be drafted, or being drafted, puts a substitute into the Army; and that is all there is of it, and just what this amendment proposes to do.

We have existing laws which exclude from the Army just the class of men the amendment proposes to provide for, and I see no reason why we should legislate further upon the subject. We have already the necessary laws to protect us in that regard. I know, and will admit, that great frauds have been perpetrated by both principals and bounty brokers in furnishing substitutes, and they should be punished. I know, in addition, that men connected with the Government have been parties to these frauds.

I know that there are men in the Old Capitol prison arrested and imprisoned for their connection with these infamous scoundrels in placing unfit men in the Army, and for their frauds upon the Government and the community. But that is no reason why the whole country should be oppressed with laws of unnecessary rigor against every man who is liable to the draft, every man liable to military duty. We need no law to make a principal who shall put a substitute in the hands and control of the Government responsible after he is mustered into the service. The burden and anxiety would be intolerable. It is for the Government to appoint men of such character and integrity as provost marshals and on the examining boards as will insure fidelity, and who will know, when men are presented, whether they are physically able for service, whether they are sound or unsound both in mind and body, and can discriminate if beyond the age, or only boys. It has come to my personal knowledge that through crime or negligence on the part of officials of the Government holding rank in its service, that old broken-down men, young boys not sixteen years of age, and lunatics, have been mustered into the service and sent to the Army only to be mustered out and sent home, totally unfit for any service. I do not believe that in the exercise of sound judgment, with integrity, such men could have found their way into the Army. The crime is not wholly confined to bounty brokers, but I fear has been too often shared by unfaithful officers.

When the provost marshal and examining officers connected with him, and the officers assigned to the duty of taking charge of and transporting substitutes to the Army, shall all be held to a just responsibility by the Secretary of War and the Provost Marshal General, under present laws, we shall have done all that is required upon the subject.

Mr. Speaker, the mode of punishment, if gentlemen of this House will look at it, is most onerous under the provisions of the proposed amendment. Men drafted who have been arrested for putting in an improper substitute, whether guilty of wrong or innocent, have to travel it may be one or two thousand miles to this city for redress. They have to present their case to the Secretary of War. I take it that the gentlemen around me know what trouble there is in getting an audience with the Secretary of War. How impossible it is for us to see him often in cases of emergency. It is not from a want of disposition on the part of the Secretary, but from the want of time. There are not hours enough in the day to meet the demands upon him. What, then, would be the condition of the men who came up here to have their cases decided? I have only to state the difficulty in order that every member may see the force of the objection, and also the great burden it will impose both upon the men charged with the offense and the War Department.

I must say one word in regard to the gentleman's criticism of the members upon this side of the Chamber. Certainly, as a member of this side of the House, I must and do most emphatically take exception to the style and manner of the remarks addressed by the chairman of the Military Committee to us. If he pretends to say that the members on this side who belong to the party with which I have the honor to be connected are not loyal, patriotic, and devoted to the welfare of the country, he says what is wrong. The country has been engaged in this struggle for its life now about four years, and there has not been a time when the Democratic party was not as steadfast to the interests of the country as the gentleman from Ohio or his party.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, I will disclaim having said any such thing as he imputes to me. I said that a large majority of the other side of the House was opposed to any draft, and I refer to the record to prove the truth of my assertion. The gentleman himself is not in that category. But I say that the records show that a majority on that side have uniformly voted against all drafting laws; and I said that the large majority there, together with others on this side of the House, made up a majority of this House. I do not believe that the gentlemen to whom I referred, constituting that majority, will vote for this bill, let us put it in what shape we will.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman say that was the only imputation he cast upon this side of the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. My remarks will be reported, and I stand by them.

Mr. ODELL. I did understand the gentleman from Ohio to say distinctly that a majority of the members upon this side of the floor would vote against this draft bill; but when the gentlemen come to read the record of the reporters it will be found that he said other things in connection with that. He said that we were found arrayed against all measures for the preservation of the Government with almost a solid front.

Mr. SCHENCK. I say so yet.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. It is not true; and when the gentleman from Ohio says that, he tells what is false, and I will tell him so here and elsewhere.

Mr. SCHENCK. These things do not disturb me at all.

Mr. ODELL. I certainly am not mistaken as to the language of the gentleman from Ohio; and it is not the first time that the manner in which the thing has been said upon that side of the House was as objectionable as it has been to every member upon this floor this morning. And, sir, I protest against this sort of language in the House of Representatives by anybody with reference to the party with which I am connected. I protest against it because it is not correct in fact; and I protest against it because it is giving aid and comfort to the enemies of our country. I would like to know how gentlemen will feel on the other side of the line when they shall read the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. What will be their inference? Simply and only that this country is divided; and southern leaders will make, as they ever have done, a good use of such language.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not much.

Mr. ODELL. And that one portion of it, almost one half, are enemies to the Government. I want no such record to go forth to the enemies of this country, North or South, nor do I want such statements to go to foreign lands, and so far as I may be enabled to prevent it it shall not, without a denial. I have no hesitation in saying that the party with which I am connected has been, from the beginning of this war up to this present hour, earnest that the power, influence, and weight of the Government should be combined and felt to the suppression of the rebellion and the overthrow of treason; but occasionally there has come from that side of the House these strictures upon the members of the party and upon its millions of voters throughout the country, nearly one half of its voting population. And I hope the last time has come when any such thing shall be said of the Democratic party, whose interests are linked with the destinies of the nation. It is our country as well as yours. With our sanction it shall never be divided. We know but one flag; following it thousands of Democrats have fallen, and now fill a soldier's grave. Thousands are now in the field and before the enemy, ready to endure hardship, toil, suffering, and death to uphold the honor and integrity of the nation, and preserve its life. The masses of the Democratic party of the country have had and intend to have a part in the redemption of this land from the wickedness, folly, and crime of secession.

We have our differences of opinions, as we have had here this morning, upon this question of enrollment. I do not know how many of my political friends will vote for this bill or against it, but they will vote according to the dictates of their consciences, as the gentleman from Ohio will. I do not know that it is an obligation upon any man to vote as it may seem best to a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, or according to the dictates of the chairman of it. We do, however, claim to exercise the privilege of voting as we choose, and in harmony with the dictates of our consciences, for what we believe to be right, and for the best interests of the country. After the proper expression of our views upon this floor as Representatives, and the majority shall adopt measures that we cannot approve, yet we shall steadfastly stand by our flag and the institutions it represents.

Now, sir, I regret exceedingly that this character of debate has occurred; and gentlemen will bear me witness that for four years I have not engaged in any such personal matter; but the time, in my judgment, seemed to have come when, for myself, my constituents, the Democratic party, and the country, these things should be said by way of rebuke here and now, and that the party to which I belong should be vindicated from the oft-repeated charge of disloyalty.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. In discussing a question of this magnitude, upon which the welfare of the nation more or less depends, I deem it entirely unwise to descend to personal recrimination, or to any degree of party spirit. After the elegant wit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side, [Mr. RANDALL,] and the magnificent display of fireworks by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] upon this side of the House, it seems to me we have lost our bearings in relation to the question now pending. Gentlemen upon the floor have the right to entertain whatever opinions they may, and cast what votes they may, and they are responsible, not to me, but to their constituents, and to those constituents they must render their account. To that body many did render their accounts at the last election, and were tried in the balance and found wanting.

Sir, I was opposed to the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yesterday, and I was also opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STREVS] yesterday. I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, because the law now provides that when a man puts into the Army a substitute, and that substitute is accepted and mustered into the service, and passes beyond the control of the principal into the control and custody of the United States, then the liability of the person sending the substitute ceases. By that amendment the principal might be subjected to punishment when he had in good faith complied with all the requirements of law. This would be unjust to the subject.

I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because under its provisions a person knowingly sending a substitute into the Army who was subject to epileptic fits, was insane, was a common drunkard, a deserter, or an escaped convict, would not be amenable to a penalty for that fraud, but the acceptance of the substitute would be conclusive on the Government. This would be unjust to the Government.

The amendment proposed to-day is simply this, that if a person knowingly and fraudulently sends a substitute who is insane, or afflicted with disease which utterly unfits him for service, or of bad moral character, or an escaped convict, or a deserter, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong, but must suffer the penalty by being himself again placed on the roll. That is the point distinguishing this amendment from those offered yesterday.

I am aware that a draft in its best sense, if not an odious, is a severe measure. It is a measure only to be resorted to in case of necessity. But when that necessity comes then the law should be made the most effective that it can possibly be. Can it be said that it is a hardship on the person who sends a substitute that he shall be punished for an absolute and positive fraud? Shall it be said that when a man gets a substitute accepted and mustered into service by means of an absolute fraud he shall not suffer the consequences? As well might it be said if I owe my friend from Pennsylvania $1,000, and pay him in money which he accepts, and which I know to be counterfeit, that I am thereby discharged both from the debt and also from all penalty for the offense.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he is opposed to this amendment because of the tribunal which is to decide upon the offense of the principal, and still suggests no other or better one. It is easy to tear down. There are many modern philosophers who would tear down the fairest fabric of religion and civil law, and who are yet unable to propose anything in place thereof.

Would the gentleman take those offenders before the courts of the country? If so, then all that I can say to the gentleman is that he could get no decision on these cases before the war ends. Courts are dilatory, and the gentleman knows it as well as I do, and the penalty would never be imposed upon the man who commits the fraud.

The gentleman says he could not leave the decision of these cases to the Secretary of War, because he is a portion of the Government. Why, sir, he is the very man to pass upon them. He has control of the military Department of the Government. He has control of the mustering of armies for the field, the discharge of soldiers, and everything connected with the movement of armies, and is supposed to be the man who knows most about these matters. He will not soil his integrity as a judge, nor disregard his oath of office. I know of no tribunal, other than this, where justice can be done within a reasonable time; and I know of no tribunal where the rights of persons will be better protected under the law, and more especially as the amendment provides that there shall be no conviction except upon due proof.

Now, I hope gentlemen will consider this measure. If gentlemen are opposed to a draft in any event, then of course they will vote against the amendment. But if, on the other hand, they are in favor of a draft, then the patriotic men will vote for it, whether upon this side of the House or upon the other. Sir, in discussing this great question, and in all questions which lie at the foundation of our Government, which lie in the way of the prosecution of this war, I abjure party. I hope I am man enough to rise above the shackles and trammels of party. I go for my country and the Constitution; I go for putting down this rebellion by every lawful means in my power. And I call on my friends on the other side of the House, who disagree with me in politics, who have disagreed with me, I have no doubt, from the time I entered into political life, to abjure their party training and come up like men and patriots, sworn to support the Constitution and the Government, and lend their aid in carrying on this war to a successful issue. If we are to have a draft let us make the draft effective. I would not put unjust or onerous burdens on the people. The draft itself is onerous enough. Still, when we are driven to have it, for the purpose of carrying on the war, let us make it effective, and say to those men who would cheat the Government: "If you do it willfully and knowingly you shall suffer the penalty."

I now move to close debate upon this section and pending amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The first question was upon the motion of Mr. ODELL, to strike out the last two lines of the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. ODELL. I withdraw that amendment.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, to insert an additional section.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That in case any substitute shall desert from the Army, and it shall appear, by evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of War, that the party furnishing such substitute shall have in any way, directly or indirectly, aided or abetted such desertion, or have been privy to any intention on the part of such substitute to desert, then such person shall be immediately placed in the Army, and shall serve for the period for which he was liable to draft, such service to commence at the date of the desertion of the substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] as amended, by inserting after the words "active service in the ranks" the following:

Or a minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, without the consent of his parent or guardian, or a minor under the age of sixteen years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 67, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Woodbridge—71.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Loan, Mallory, Marey, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John James R. Morris, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Srouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—67.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Holman, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, King, Le Blond, Long, McAllister, McDowell, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Thomas, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Worthington—44.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COX said: I ask leave to vote, having been absent on a committee of conference, when my name was called.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object. I do not think that gives a member a right to have his vote recorded after his name has been called and he has not responded to the call of his name.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that being upon a committee of conference does not give a member the right to vote, if absent at the time his name was called. The Chair, however, will look up the authority on that subject, and announce it before the result of the vote is announced.

The call of the roll having been completed,

The SPEAKER said: The chair will read the authorities upon the subject of a member of a committee of conference voting, from Barclay's Digest, page 185:

"A member of a committee of conference, absent when his name is called, has no right to have his vote recorded. But, according to the practice, a member absent by leave of the House is usually permitted, by a vote of the House, or by unanimous consent, to have his vote recorded; but not after the result is announced, unless his vote will not change the result."

By unanimous consent, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] will be allowed to have his vote recorded.

No objection being made,

Mr. COX voted in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," approved May 6, 1864;

An act (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor;

An act (H. R. No. 763) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly in Massachusetts; and

An act (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding to the first section of the amendment just adopted the following:

Provided, That no such decision shall be made by the Secretary of War, unless made on notice to the party within thirty days after the substitute shall have been mustered into the service.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and STEVENS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 56.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 63, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Loan, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Srouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Gooch, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Woodbridge—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Finck, Grinnell, Hall, Higby, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Pike, Robinson, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Thomas, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Worthington—47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 81, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Smithers, Webster, Williams, Wilder, and Woodbridge—53.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Brooks, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Deulson, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Loan, Mallory, Marey, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Shannon, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Srouse, Sweet, Thayer, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Baxter, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Deming, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Robinson, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Stuart, Thomas, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—48.

So a call of the House was not ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that Mr. SPALDING was absent on account of indisposition.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to rescind for this day only the order fixing the adjournment at half past five o'clock, p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 690, to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at ten minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, February 27, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. John TONNER, of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, a copy of the instructions issued by that Department relative to the enrollment of citizens of the State of Louisiana; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, a copy of the report of Thomas Hood and S. W. Bostwick, special commissioners appointed to investigate and report upon the condition and treatment of colored refugees in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the following communication; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, February 25, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the Senate of the 23d ultimo, calling for a statement of the "number of soldiers and sailors, stating each separately, the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia have furnished the Army and Navy under all the calls heretofore made, setting forth the number demanded, and the number furnished under each call and the time for which the same were enlisted."

Having submitted the subject to the consideration of the President, I am directed by him not to communicate this information called for on the ground that its publication, a the present time, would be detrimental to the public interests.

So much of this information as relates to each particular State is to be found on the records of that State, and is subject to its use and reference, settlements having been made from time to time with the authorities of the States, and satisfactory adjustments arrived at.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

The President of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a communication of Norman Ward, addressed to the joint committee on the conduct of the war, upon the subject of great guns; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying for the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of John Baker, of the city of New York, and John S. Jackson and Henry Munro, of Valparaiso, assignees of E. Mickle & Co., praying payment of drafts drawn by Adam Johnston, sub-Indian agent, for provisions for the California Indians in 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition of William P. Williams, praying that a fog whistle may be located on Beavertail; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.
